NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 469—Vol. XIX.] NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 24, 1864. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly, 13 Weeks $1 00.

Commencement of Volume XIX.

Another volume opens with this number of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, the most successful illustrated paper in the country, as its long career shows; for one after another the rivals which have risen have disappeared, after a brief and ineffectual attempt to compete with us in enterprise, tact and a full understanding of what the American public in their good taste require of any one who claims to instruct and interest them.

With a staff of special artists, whom long training has made unequalled, our facilities are almost incredible, and the truthfulness of our sketches makes the paper really one of the wonders of our time. In Europe the merits of are so well-known, the accuracy and ability of its sketches are so instinctively felt, that it is the exclusive source, we may say, to which men turn for illustrations of American affairs.

This position has not been acquired without labor, judgment, expense and untiring watchfulness; and we intend to relax in no degree our efforts to render our paper, with every issue, additionally interesting. It is, and shall continue to be, the real illustrated record of all that is exciting, absorbing, curious or interesting that occurs around us.

Of our illustrations of the war it is needless to speak; but now that the war is so rapidly approaching to a close, now that a glorious peace will soon witness the country reunited under the Federal Government, we promise a weekly paper filled with matter as full of interest and attraction, as valuable and instructive as ever.

Our literary department improves with time. The corps of graceful American writers drawn around us contribute interesting tales, which, independent of being illustrated as our tales and poems are, stand unrivalled in skill and power. Our paper is thus not only the best Illustrated Newspaper, but in every sense a Family Paper of the highest order and merit.

Subscribers whose terms have expired, and all who wish to have Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper a weekly visitor, should now promptly renew their subscriptions.

The Crisis is Past—The Military and Political Situation.

The crisis is past. The Union will live. The day of deliverance dawns in the brightening sky. Our great sacrifices in this sanguinary and exhausting war will soon be crowned with the enduring reward—the incalculable blessings—the exalting consummation of a glorious and permanent peace. We congratulate our readers and the friends of human progress throughout the country, and in both hemispheres, embracing the four continents, and all the islands of the sea, upon the glorious prospect before us. From the James river to the Mississippi, from the Appomattox to the Chattahoochee, from the mountains of the Tennessee to the waters of Mobile bay, the salvos of victory from the heroic soldiers and sailors of the Union are answering each other. The military situation has never been so good, the final issue never so clear as now, and all the political developments and signs of the times, East and West, North and South, are qually encouraging.

The wail of agony which comes up from the rebel capital over the fall of Atlanta tells more impressively than facts and figures can the deadly character of the blow which has there been given to the reeling Southern despotism of Jeff Davis. The desperate but futile efforts of Gen. Lee to extricate himself from the inflexible grasp of Gen. Grant, show that the fate of Vicksburg or Chattanooga is settling over Richmond. In a word, the rebel leaders have brought their cause to the point of exhaustion and certain ruin, in staking their fortunes upon a struggle of the limited military forces and resources of the rebellious States, against the tremendous power, means and appliances of the Government and the loyal States. In the outset, with the substantial wealth, the ruling class, the servile race, and the bulk of the able-bodied white men of thirteen States (may we not say fourteen)? with a population exceeding twelve millions at his service, the daring enterprise of Jeff Davis depended mainly for success upon doubtful contingencies of outside assistance. Now, with this great original conspiracy practically reduced from thirteen or fourteen to some half dozen States, or rather parts of States, and from twelve millions of people to less than five, more than one-half blacks, and with all expectations of foreign aid abandoned, surely we may say that the issue of the contest is already determined, and that the Southern Confederacy is defunct.

We have from time to time touched upon this suggestive contrast between the original strength and present weakness of the rebellion, to cheer the brave and to lift up the desponding on the Union side. But in a few touches, as with a master's pencil, Gen. Grant, in a a recent familiar letter to the Hon. E. B. Washburne, has so forcibly portrayed the exhaustion of the Davis Confederacy, that we cannot refrain from the reproduction of this reliable testimony. Gen Grant says that "the rebels have now in their ranks their last man;" that "their little boys and old men are guarding prisoners, guarding railroad bridges, and forming a good part of their garrisons for entrenched positions;" that "any man lost by them cannot be replaced;" that "they have robbed the cradle and the grave equally to get their present force;" that "besides what they lose in frequent skirmishes and battles, they are now losing, from desertions and other causes, at least one regiment per day;" and that "their only hope is now a divided North." All dreams of foreign intervention—all hopes of arresting the onward movements of our fleets and armies are abandoned. "Their only hope is now a divided North."

But what division can they be hoping for? We will let Gen. Grant explain. He says, "I have no doubt but the enemy are exceedingly anxious to hold out until after the Presidential election." And wherefore? Because "they have many hopes from its effects. They hope a counter-revolution; they hope the election of a peace candidate; in fact, like Micawber, they hope for something to turn up." These statements of Gen. Grant are abundantly established by the late Jeremiads of the Richmond journals. Their military misfortunes, they plead, must be retrieved within the next 60 days, in order to create dissensions, divisions and a political revolution in the North, or their Southern Confederacy is at an end. Their hopes, in brief, rest upon the peace leaders of the Northern Democracy, and the dubious peace promises of the Chicago platform, through the agency of the peace-at-any-price faction of the loyal States.

But even these hopes must now be cast to the winds. Without touching the issue between the claims of the Administration and the Opposition, it will suffice for our present purpose that Gen. McClellan's letter of acceptance of the Chicago nomination cuts him clearly adrift from the peace-at-any-price faction. He will have nothing less, as a basis of peace, than one Government for the whole country, nothing less than the Union, under the Constitution of the United States. In taking this position Gen. McClellan extinguishes this last hope of the rebel leaders and their Northern sympathisers of a disunion peace through his election to the Presidency. He tells them, substantially, that even with his election, short of the submission of the rebellious States to the Union there can be no peace. He cannot stultify himself. He cannot write his own condemnation in a false confession that as a soldier of the Union he has been guilty of prosecuting a needless and unholy war. What the peace-at-any-price faction may do in the premises is a matter of small concern. It is enough that by Gen. McClellan's letter they are disarmed and rendered powerless for further mischief.

We therefore congratulate the country that the one essential mentioned by Gen. Grant as demanded for the complete success of the Union cause—a "unity of sentiment North," is substantially secured; for whatever may be the result of the Presidential struggle, the question of a Southern Confederacy on any terms and the peace-at-any-price faction of the North are practically thrown out of the canvass. Jeff Davis can have no further interest in the success of the Chicago ticket, his ultimatum being "Southern independence or Southern extermination." His Northern adherents are set aside. They can have no interest in fomenting "a counter revolution" which promises no compensation. The war, in any event, will be prosecuted to the ultimatum of one Government for the North and South under the Federal Constitution. The rebellion is fairly within the grasp of Gen. Grant. The last danger of a Northern "counter revolution" is over, the last serious obstruction is removed. Our course is clear. The speedy success of the Union cause is assured. The end draws nigh. The brighter day of a "more perfect Union" and an enduring peace approaches, and its blessings will extend to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Summary of the Week.

GRANT'S ARMY.

On Saturday, the 10th, the enemy's picket line in front of Hancock's position was seized by De Trobriand's brigade of Mott's division, almost without firing a shot.

Longstreet now holds the extreme right of the enemy's line between the Weldon road and Hill's corps.

SHERIDAN'S ARMY.

Sheridan reached Berryville on the 2d. The 23d Ohio was sent out on Sinkert Ferry road, and the 36th Ohio on Winchester pike, running to the right from Berryville. Crook's command went into camp, and had just finished pitching tents at about 4 o'clock, when heavy skirmishing was heard on the picket line. The whole command rapidly turned out, and was formed and moved to the support of the pickets, who had been driven from behind some entrenchments which they occupied. The 36th Ohio and 9th Virginia were formed, and charged the enemy, driving them out of the entrenchments. A desperate struggle now ensued, the rebels being determined, if possible, to regain possession of the entrenchments. With this object in view, they massed no less than two divisions, and hurled them with their accustomed ferocity against our gallant little band, which was supported by both Duvall's and Thoburn's divisions. They were handsomely repulsed every time they charged. The conflict lasted long after the sun had set, and artillery firing was kept up until 9 o'clock. Our loss will amount to about 300 killed and wounded.

On the 5th Sheridan found Gen. Lomax's cavalry and a division of rebel infantry in his front at Stevenson's depot, near Bunker Hill.

Torbert defeated a cavalry force at Snicker's and Ashby's gaps.

Colonel Lowell and Col. Gibbs have recently destroyed the mills on the Opequan which were turning out flour for Early's forces.

On the 10th Early attacked a brigade of Averill's division at 8 A. M. at Darksville, but was repulsed in three successive charges.

The Tallahassee, in her brief career, destroyed nearly 40 valuable vessels.

TENNESSEE.

Wheeler's operations in Tennessee, intended to isolate Sherman, proved an utter failure. He succeeded in destroying only one bridge, and the whole damage to the Chattanooga railroad is already repaired.

All this is poor compensation for the loss of the freebooter Morgan, who was surprised on Sunday, Sept. 4, at Greenville, by Gen. Gillem, who routed the rebel force, killing nearly 100, including Morgan, capturing 75, with one cannon and caisson. Morgan's whole staff was taken.

On Saturday, Sept. 3, 3,000 rebel cavalry under Williams and Robertson, with three pieces of artillery, were attacked by Milroy, near Murfreesboro. The battle lasted all day, and on the 4th the rebels retired to Truine, followed by Milroy.

Rousseau, in his pursuit of Wheeler, captured 500 horses at Duck river.

GEORGIA.

After the defeat at Jonesboro the rebels fled South, and Hood, by turnpike, took the same direction and joined them at Lovejoy's station, 30 miles south of Atlanta, where he threw up stoneworks. Sherman followed, but finding that it would not pay to assault, returned to Atlanta.

In his fight at Jonesboro he captured "Brig.-Gen. Gorman and about 2,000 prisoners, with eight guns and much plunder."

He thus sums up all:

"We have, as the result of this quick, and, as I think, well executed movement, 27 guns, over 3,000 prisoners, and have buried over 400 rebel dead, and left as many wounded; they could not be removed.

"The rebels have lost besides the important city of Atlanta and stores, at least 500 dead, 2,500 wounded, and 3,000 prisoners, whereas our aggregate loss will not foot 1,500.

"If that is not success, I don't know what is.
"Signed, SHERMAN, Maj.-Gen."

ALABAMA.

The raid of the rebel Gen. Wheeler has terminated in his retreat to Florence, in this State, where he was joined by Roddy.

MISSISSIPPI.

A considerable rebel force under Gen. Polignac is reported to have crossed the Mississippi from Arkansas to Rodney, Miss., on the 22d.

Gen. Polignac, with his rebel division, dashed into Natchez and took some prisoners, but immediately retired.

FLORIDA.

An expedition, under Capt. Childs, started from Cedar Keys on July 1st, and penetrated to Brooksville and Bayport, captured men, horses and contrabands. Major Weeks also destroyed a cotton depot in St. Andrew's bay and at Otto creek. In August he ran up the Suwanee and destroyed a large quantity of stores. His boat, the Ella Morse, was attacked on his return, but with little loss. At Clay's landing the rebel assailants were terribly handled.

LOUISIANA.

Gen. A. L. Lee, of Herron's army, on the 24th, had a fight with the enemy on the Clinton road, 17 miles from Baton Rouge, in which the rebels lost 150 men and the town of Clinton, with a large amount of stores.

Col. Farrar, on the 25th, surprised a rebel party opposite Natchez, killing and taking many.

The transports White Cloud and Henry Chouteau were fired at near Bayou Sara, on the 29th.

NAVAL.

Our Government has at last awoke to its injustice to our gallant tars. We gave portraits of returned prisoners. These, wretched as they are from ill-treatment, are yet better than the poor sailors, some of whom have been in captivity more than two years.

Admiral Farragut has been instructed by the Navy Department not to exchange his prisoners excepting for officers and men belonging to our naval forces a long time ago captured by the rebels, and who are confined in Texas.

The Tallahassee, in her brief career, destroyed nearly 40 vessels.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ANOTHER of the famous rebel privateers, the Georgia, has come to grief. The Niagara seized her 20 miles off Lisbon, put a prize crew on board and sent her to New York. The Georgia, when seized, was under the British flag, and her captain entered a protest against her seizure. It is reported that general satisfaction was expressed in London at the capture, though there was much difference of opinion as to its legality.

The London press seems to consider the seizure of the Georgia as perfectly regular, and quotes a decision of Lord Stowell in a case exactly similar.

The French Provincial Councils had begun to assemble, and two of the Cabinet Ministers had delivered important addresses with reference to the contemplated extension of the powers of those bodies. M. Rouher and M. Rowland were the speakers, and they agreed that the result of the movement is to be a considerable decentralization.

Serious election riots have taken place in Geneva, Switzerland. The Federal Commissioners arrived there with Federal militia and restored order.

The pirate Florida sailed from Santa Cruz, Teneriffe, on the 4th of August, on a cruise.

The Army and Navy Gazette, in alluding to the Peace party in the North, says: "We are told of 100,000 people meeting to support Gen. McClellan. Does any one believe that a military President, who has been beaten in the field by Confederate Generals, is going to proclaim peace at the head of his armies? Certainly if he does, it will only be the signal for danger to the neighbors of the North and of the South."

The Times, in a leader on American affairs, observes that while each succeeding month displays the unbending firmness of the South, there are many signs of a relaxation of purpose among their opponents. The nomination of Gen. McClellan as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency is now not unlikely, if the will of New York should prevail with the representatives of the party. The principles of Gen. McClellan are not very clear. He has always been looked upon as a War Democrat, as being as anxious for Union and the old Constitution as any man in the land, but when events move so rapidly men move with them. Should any opponent of Mr. Lincoln be elected, there can hardly be a doubt that the policy of the present President will be abandoned during the ensuing year. On the other hand, it may be doubted if the Republicans are more inclined for the recognition of the South, or even for reconciliation, than they were a year ago."

The Army and Navy Gazette admits that the Federal success at Mobile, even in its present proportions, is considerable, and as regards peace, it declares its belief that the existence of a peace party is mythical, and that as long as there is a ray of hope the North will march onward to its end—empire.

A Paris letter says: "Unpleasant dispatches have been received at the War Ministry from Africa. The Algerine insurrection is not yet put down.

"Marshal McMahon will be compelled to break up the camp at Chalons earlier than was expected, and will proceed to the seat of his Government with several regiments under his orders."

The French Government was extremely angry at the publication of the Danish documents. Indeed M. Drouyn L'Huys has reproached M. De Moultke with having perverted his words.

The altercation has been extremely undiplomatic.

The French Cabinet Ministers were engaged in speech making at the various meetings of the Provincial Councils-General.

The Duke De Persigny, at St. Etienne, had been eulogizing the Emperor as the founder of liberty in France, and at Marseilles M. Behu, Member of Commerce, had been making promises in the interest of trade and commerce.

The Emperor was about to visit the camp at Chalons.

The Duke of Augustenburg had dispatched to Frankfort a memorial establishing the validity of his claims to the Schleswig-Holstein throne, as demanded by the Federal Diet.

The municipalities from several of the Holstein towns had met at Nieumester. A resolution was passed thanking the Allies and recognising the necessity of the duchies joining Germany, and, as far as German interests demanded, Prussia in particular, without prejudice, however, to their independence.

The resolution further states that the establishment of a provisional Government cannot be regarded as a proper means to secure the object in view, and fears are expressed lest the generally desired speedy settlement of the affairs of the country, as regards its foreign relations, will be thereby unnecessarily deferred.

TOWN GOSSIP.

WE have all heard the newsbearer's assertion that the Dutch have taken Holland, but few of us know positively that once a year the Teutons take New York. We say once a year, but this must be with a reservation, for though the Turnfest is a yearly institution no celebration of it has been held in New York since 1859. This year our German population have made up for the deprivation and have gone into the enjoyment with a reckless hilarity. At this meeting almost every society of Turners through the country has been represented, and the week has been given up to mirth and music, beer, balls and bar-rooms. They have had torchlight processions, jaunts to Central Park, grand concerts, declamation and singing, gymnastic wonders, wrestling and prize shooting, and every other enjoyment which a German knows so well how to take at the least possible cost.

What a pity it is that Americans cannot learn from these frugal people a lesson in amusement and relaxation. A German will sit out his evening chatting or singing, listening to a little music, or doing a little waltzing, all at the cost and with the drinking of a couple of mugs of beer at an expense of ten cents. An American thinks it necessary to pass his evening running from one bar-room to another, imbibing powerful spirits as though they were so much water, talking loud-mouthed politics, during a little turn at swearing, and possibly ending off the evening with a bout at fisticuffs and a lodging in the station-house. At one time we did think that the introduction of lager would do much towards moderating our desires as a spirit-drinking people, but the result does not show in that direction.

It is a favorite diversion with country people to hold up their hands in holy horror at the wickedness and viciousness of New York, and to attribute whatever of lawlessness and chicanery that may occur in the provinces to New York men and influence. We have a striking instance of this just now before us in the comments of country papers on the dissipation and vice of Saratoga and Newport. They point to the hard and jaded faces of those who gather nightly about the tables of Morrissey at Saratoga and of Watson at Newport, and cry derisively: "These are your boasted merchants, lawyers and millionaires of the model city, and this is their diversion!" We most emphatically deny this, and contend that the vice, gambling and dissipation of these places comes from every part of the land, but especially from the rural districts. It is your country gentleman and village professional who breaks annually away from the monotony of his life, and rushes headlong into every dissipation for a few weeks, if not longer. A canvass of city gambling dens would show the great majority of their frequenters to be countrymen, and we do not believe that any difference exists between them and those of the watering-places. They make the greatest gourmands, from the fact that during the greater part of the year they are denied the luxuries that a New Yorker sees about him every day. A city man goes into the country with his limited education in malice and poker, flattering himself that he can take the cap off the fresh in anything in that line about the district, when all of a sudden, perhaps at some far away country tavern, he sees a well-whiskbroomed party, with an immense cast of countenance, that can discount him on every dodge ever known to the most expert gambler, sitting down his entire pile with cold-blooded calmness, and drink more milk during his entire sojourn than the city gent could ever look at. No, no! Monsieurs of the rural press, it is the country that can take the cake for service and imagination, not the city the country. The rural press can become as great as it can adapt, and is notorious in his locality to stay home with safety, and, as a matter of course, destroy his merit on the spot. The records of the police will easily show this fact, and the banks of the city are also well aware that they are supported by country custom.

Among events of the week worthy of especial mention is the capture by the police of the grand overseer of the Creation, with whom we have been favored on previous days. But at Jones's Wood, under the direction of Forrest and Auschutz, has for this interference.

There is a high-handed tyranny in this movement which the town will not be stimulated to see. Were liberties and enjoyments are to be thus surrendered without protest. We are to be allowed to be a free people. With reference to the morality of the performance, we have in the matter of mere calculation of the chances and the heart and bring the hearer nearer to the divine spirit, than a thousand times as many of some 20 score of preachers who hold forth in the conventicles of the city. Certainly, few words but such as mean nothing. The idea that the managers of the affair were suffered to go on at a great expense in maturing the whole affair, and only at the last moment a whim of the chief of police decided to put a stop to it, and that thousands were looking forward to as an innocent and exciting amusement, treat with the rights of citizens, and laugh at all remonstrance. Oh! the bleatings of a free land!

We admire cunning ability it is of a very high nature how skillfully he may achieve his villainy, always leaves some loophole for detection. Some are thrust out of his possession of the money gained by the act of rascality, and leave their judgment in the hands of agents to plan means of safety. Thus it is we hear of "able detectives" who "ferret out" and know our fugitives and recover the proceeds of the crime, when apparently no human foresight could prevail. The matter is very plain. The criminal is to be detected simply what are the habits of the man, and what would be his course if he chose to commit such a crime as was committed? But not the man, as though acting under some working of fate, but the man who knows his person in gold, walks deliberately on board the city of Edinburgh steamer, and is arrested by those "able detectives" who have only calculated upon that statement or crime, and come to the very point where the man they would find the blind criminal who walked in the dark as destruction.

We are now far into the middle of September, and very soon the ball will begin to set in upon us and stoves and hot drinks become fashionable. We are not complaining this, let us look back upon the season that is past, and give it its due. Despite the grumbling that scarcity of labor, there never have been greater crops produced, and the majority of the poor have never been plenty. Fruits and vegetables have poured in upon us in lavish profusion, and though there has been to support. Economy only will carry him through, and that with his elevated ideas of increased wages he will find a hard thing for him to practice. The next week the end of this year, which will see 100,000 seafers after employment upon the community.

And now we will close the theatres.

The event of the week has been the opening of the Olympics. Very little has been done to alter the appearance of the old house with the name of "Miranda Olympic" has been most beautifully put upon the stage. In this particular the house is certainly the gem from every theatre in the land. Of the new play there is little to be said. It owes its success to the admirable mounting and to the careful treatment of the company. In the usual style of the Olympic piece it makes you by bubilities and makes Miriam do many foolish things, which all tend to bring all in the end to happy and harriages and all that sort of thing, and so forth. If introduced a new actor to the Olympic public, Mr. Holston, who made rather a success, and was called out for the customary.

Mrs. John Wood, in "The Comical Countess," was received by all her friends with a welcome that shows she has a firm hold on their affections.

The Theatre seems to be making quite a success, with Mr. Owens as Joshua Butterby, in Tom Taylor's comedy of "Everybody's Friend." Daly is very clever, and Mr. Owens' interpretation of Butterby's whistle and every one sees on the New York, condu.

Heller opened on Thursday, and made a very large heap of houses, which is satisfactory, but he does not be a series of new tricks to suffocation, but he does some new ones. The "Black Art" is the best and some of the tricks. The trick—for so he calls it himself—of the "Golden Watch," is certainly the most impudent, and perhaps even put before the public, and action of the scene. His Anthropoleon are funny, and when they have had a little more practice in their parts will be a far higher attraction than the real Negro Minstrels.

Barnum has all the Tom Thumb family once more together, and has a number of them in a crowded room most ill drawn. He has also just brought out a Mr. Wemble dramatic piece, "The Mountain King Sapphire," which seems to have exactly struck the taste of his audiences.

We think New York, with seven Theatres, an Opera House, a Museum, and Prince Murat's Ball, had a hundred of other places of amusement, will be able to get along this winter.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—New York is to have a new cemetery, on the Woodlawn, on the Harlem railroad, north of the city, about a mile and a quarter from the end of Williamsbridge. Funeral parties are to be carried over the railroad by special cars at reduced rates, and the expense of carriage here, which is necessarily incurred in reaching the older New York cemeteries, will thus be avoided.

Both New York Central and other railroad companies are also negotiating for the right to use it.

These enemies have appeared earlier and more numerous this season. We learn that the ignorance and irresistible prejudice of the negroes will cause them to keep sweeping the fields with a reid which puts to shame the most destructive insects, and the first of all its human imitators. The prospects for sugar are equally discouraging. Nine-tenths of a majority of the sugar cultivators having been seduced from their proper vocation by the temptations of cotton. A very small number of the planters will make cane enough to seed for next year's crop. Of this small number will by wood for the furnaces. There will be, in Louisiana, a planting and harvesting crop of 450,000 hogsheads of 1861 and 1862, which deck ed in 1863 to 40,000 hogsheads, and in 1864 to 15,000 hogsheads.

Art, Science and Literature.—At the Derby Gallery, Broadway, is now open a splendid exhibition of paintings, consisting mainly of the works of the late Thomas Cole, a laboratory of the present war on our own soil. Though mainly founded on the American school of landscape art—if we may use such a term—these works have been evidently painted with a thorough love for our own soil, and if we except to the want of foreground and the somewhat atmosphere of the Old World, are very telling and true, while in one or two instances they are remarkably fine. The celebrated picture, Oxch, for example, or No. 119, painted by Signor Del Re, of Naples, is a work of great merit, while in its subject and masterly handling, deserves the highest praise. It is a picture of Italian peasant life, and is very natural, while its feeling is simple and touchingly wonderful. The figure of the old woman with the distaff is admirably watched by his faithful dog, who has followed him from the hills to the village, and is full of character and in invention and truly pathetic. There is also a large picture, No. 118, by Michael Cammuleo, of Naples, 1797, by Michel Cammuleo, which is full of merit and will be found to be a very interesting work of art situation to a painting by Constant Mayer, which, of course, is the leading picture of the exhibition, as more distinctly being the gem of the exhibition, as it is the largest picture and represents a Catholic Archiepiscopal Statue of Mercy, during the sanguinary Revolution of 1793, in the Vendean soldier. The figures are likenesses, and the rest are imaginary, and the whole picture is one which it has been imagined and rendered, by Mr. Mayer, very successfully throughout the whole work in the delicate originality of its treatment, demands for it a careful study, and will be found to repay the effort. It is a canvas which ought to be engraved, and if it were, would be found in the parlor of every family with a relative in the service of our country, that could afford to purchase it. Mr. Mayer is a young artist, and sincerely hope that Mr. Mayer will find some publisher of it, that he may be enabled to issue a faithful and reasonable copy from his exquisite picture. If the right man could be found to do it, there would be as the right work upon which to speculate. It would be found to be a most popular engraving, especially while to the outside repetition of the artist, it must, of course, be remembered, be a work of interest to all who love art not to omit the chance of visiting the Derby gallery, for by the time of publication of the three paintings we have specified in our brief notice.

THE WORKINGWOMEN OF NEW YORK.

The workingwomen of New York employed by Government, who are making army shirts at six cents each, have petitioned for a rise of five cents, under this appeal to the Secretary of War.

Surely even in a great war we cannot become parties to such a grinding down of workingwomen.

To the Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

SIR—We the undersigned Workingwomen of the City of New York, most respectfully appeal to your Excellency, and we relate the causes which have compelled us to seek relief in this way, in the confidence of which you are an honored representative.

We are the widows of this unhappy rebellion, which has desolated so many hearthstones, and we are the wives of husbands who at the call of Abraham Lincoln were barely sufficient to enable us to obtain a livelihood.

We have every opinion of the necessity of our appeal can be adduced, and that is the high price of all the necessaries of life, coupled with the fact that women's wages are the same now as they were before the commencement of the rebellion.

We do not come before you to ask alms, but to ask that women, many of whom have sacrificed the dearest relations of life, may be allowed to earn bread.

We appeal to those in authority to do all in their power to relieve the distress of misery which is the result of war.

We do not be said that the Government turns a deaf ear to the prayer of women who have given their all to the country.

What we ask is, an order to the Quartermaster-General, authorizing an increase of five cents on the labor, until it shall approximate to the price of living.

We have been told repeatedly that we can find employment elsewhere, to so modify the contract system as to give us work. This is impossible, as it is the policy of the Government prices. We feel assured that no other answer will be returned to us than that which has been presented in you, than the fact that to-day thousands of widows and orphans, whose husbands, fathers and brothers have fallen on the battlefield, are looking with sighs at the needle.

In the name of justice and humanity, we implore you to aid us in our poverty to remedy this evil.

Trusting in Him who has promised to be a father to the fatherless, and the widow's friend, we leave our case to your favorable consideration, and we shall ever pray.

Signed by over two thousand women, and the signatures have not been in vain.

We have the honor to subscribe ourselves.

A ROMANTIC HISTORY.

A SARATOGA correspondent tells the following story of a young bridal couple, guests at that watering place:

"It was the summer of 1860, Senor B——, the son of a wealthy Cuban planter, was staying at Saratoga. While there he met a young lady, whom we will call Dorcelle F., daughter of a well-known Mobile banker. They became acquainted with each other, and all things being satisfactory, became betrothed, and were married.

The Cuban marriage was appointed for the 16th of August, 1861. Mr. Dorcelle F. and family with his gentleman went back to Cuba to arrange and settle matters previous to the time of consummating matrimony in the United States.

About a month before the time appointed for the nuptials to take place, the Mobile banker received and accepted a commission in the artillery service in the Confederate service, and in his first battle, a few weeks after, was killed. Mr. and Mrs. B—— were much involved the family in great embarrassment, and from a wealthy position they found themselves in comparative security and poverty.

Hearing the news of affairs being made known to the father of the young man, he broke off the match, and immediately left for Cuba, communicating the matter through the mentions of blockade-runners.

"Time heals every wound," and so did it here, when the old man dying, left the son free to wed the maiden of his choice. Accordingly they were married, and after several delays reached Mobile. He thought found that his bride had died of yellow fever, and that he had succumbed to the fell destroyer, and following her husband fell victim to the fever. Thus ends the story of a romance for young ladies.

"I took a little while upon the meeting between the young couple; the school was given up, the parties separated, and the young husband returned to Cuba, then, they arrived in safety at Nassau. From thence they came to Havana, and after staying a few weeks, set out for this place, where, free from the cares of business and life, they, in this hoped, if appearances do not deceive them, enjoying as much happiness as it is fated that mortals shall enjoy on this mundane sphere."

One of the most interesting facts for the students of religious history, has come to light in Edward Palgrave in his pioneer journey through the interior of Arabia. He has discovered the last of all gypsies-tion belief that it was the express scheme of the prophet to establish a universal religion. He found in the Kingdom of Kid Shomer, never before traversed by a European, among the strictest Mahommedans, and in the neighborhood of the Wahabis, the strictest kind of Puritans of the Mahommedan faith, he found persons that the worship of the sun, of trees, of fire and of the north star, among the remarkable trace of fake-the same word as that used by Moses, as described in the Book of Kuzzaz. There is no doubt that in the out-of-the-way parts of the Arabian peninsula, and among the nomadic tribes of the interior, ancient forms of worship still hold their ground. Mr. Palgrave is now engaged in preparing for the press his work, and it will probably appear in the spring of next year.

THE REBEL GENERAL MORGAN.

BRIG.-GEN. JOHN H. MORGAN was the eldest of six brothers, all of whom have been in the rebel service. He was born near Lexington, Ky., about the year 1826, and was the son of a manufacturer of jeans in that neighborhood. He received his education, also, in that State. He raised a company of Kentuckians for the Mexican war, but failed to get it into service.* After that war had ended he entered into the jean business, and married a Miss Rebecca Bruce, since dead. When the rebellion broke out he raised a band of guerrillas in Kentucky, he being at that time a captain of the "Lexington Rifles," a militia organization, and went with them into the seceded States.

From his early youth he had been a daring, reckless rider, and was well suited to the line of the service he had chosen. He first began his operations in Missouri, where his name at last became a terror and a bugbear. He then moved into Kentucky, operated near Bacon creek, and harassed the Union army of the Ohio during their advance towards Nashville. He had attached to his staff a telegraph operator named Ellsworth, who, before despatches were sent in cypher, would take the orders of the Union officers from the wires, and thus defeat all plans of Union operations, the rebels being ready to meet them. For his skill he was appointed a Colonel, and afterwards a Brigadier-General, of the provisional army of the rebel States.

During November, 1862, he was acting with Bragg in Tennessee, and was there married to a Miss Ready, who ran the blockade to Murfreesboro for that purpose. He continued his operations south of the Cumberland river until July, 1863, when he made his dash through Kentucky into Indiana and Ohio, on which occasion he and his band were captured and imprisoned. He dug his way out of his cell on the night of November 27, 1863, and, after many hazardous escapes, succeeded in reaching the rebel lines late in December.

He then set about raising a new command, under orders from the rebel War Department of Jan. 25, 1864, and during the early summer of the present year he was again in the saddle, operating in Western Virginia and Eastern Kentucky. The States bordering on the Ohio river soon raised men enough to resist his advance, and his raid resulted in a failure. His command was, therefore, attached to the cavalry forces operating around Atlanta, and served under Wheeler during the recent raids upon Sherman's communications. During this last raid he has lost his life, as the following telegram announced:

BELL'S GAP, TENN., Sept. 4, 1864.

TO GEN. TILLSON.—I surprised, defeated and killed John Morgan at Greenville this morning.

The killed are scattered for miles, and have not yet been counted, and probably number 50 or 100.

I have about 75 prisoners.

Among those captured were Morgan's staff, with one piece of artillery and a caisson.

The enemy's force outnumbered mine, but the surprise was complete.

ALLEN C. GILVES.

THE LATE BRIGADIER-GENERAL JOHN H. MORGAN, C. S. A., AND HIS WIFE.

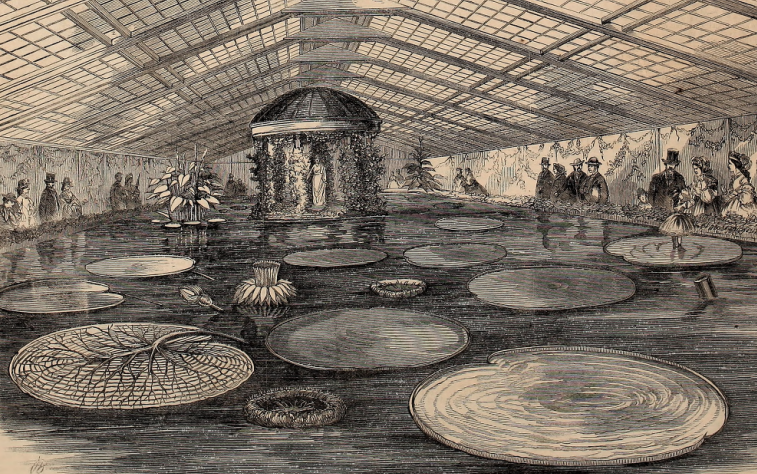
Few men have occupied more of the public attention, but few of the rebel Generals showed so little ability in command or courage in the field.

THE VICTORIA REGIA.

THERE is seldom an opportunity such as that afforded now in New York, of seeing in flower the giant water lily of South America, the Victoria regia. Of all plants the water lily seems most ethereal and least of earth. Rising from the pure water, it opens its snowy petals, diffusing its delicate perfume, and then at sunset folds its leaves and sinks away from sight. The lilies of our lakes and ponds are, however, but pigmies to the Victoria regia, of which three specimens are now on exhibition at the corner of West 59th street and 8th avenue.

This magnificent plant can there be seen, with its giant leaves floating on the water and the flower in the centre. The flower but measures from six to nine inches from base to tip; each bud as it appears being accompanied by a young leaf; there are four sepals of a purple color, fading to white at the edges, very thorny without. The petals or flower leaves are 50 or 60 in number, in three distinct sets, each smaller towards the stamens, the outer ones white, six or seven inches long, of the most delicate tissue and lace-like appearance. The stamens form a corona on the central disk. The whole flower is about 14 inches in diameter.

The flower opens about seven o'clock in the evening, diffusing its rich perfume, and remains open till seven in the morning. So accurate is this closing and opening of its beauties that it does not vary five minutes from day to day. When a new flower bud rises above the water, that already in flower having performed its allotted task, sinks.



The leaves are nearly circular, turned up two or four inches at the margin, green above and crimson below. Eight large veins and numberless veinlets mark its surface. A full grown leaf measures from four to six feet, but is very tender and delicate. By placing a board on it, a child can be supported on it, as shown in the illustration.

This plant was first discovered about 60 years ago by Hinke, in Central America, then found by Bonpland in the Pauma and Paraguay, and by Poppeg in Peru. D'Orbigny sent specimens to Europe.

In the Amazon, in bends and bays of the river, it is found of the largest size, the flower twenty inches in diameter, the leaves three or four yards, and thick enough when piled on each other to bridge small streams.

Mr. Bolleo, the proprietor, for his zeal to bring this royal plant to perfection, is entitled to the greatest credit; it has indeed cost him dearly, his health having been seriously impaired, inasmuch as the plant, being tropical, requires a high degree of temperature.

AN African lion in the Zoological Museum in Brussels was so upset a sufferer from disease in his feet that a surgical operation recently became necessary. This was done by a veterinary surgeon and five pupils at some risk, and by the aid of mechanical contrivances. The lion bore the operation well, with now and then a roar when it felt the knife; its general good behavior being attributed to the circumstance that a keeper, to whom the lion is much attached, sat near its head and endeavored to calm it by talking, evidently not without effect.

SIEGE OF RICHMOND—VIEW FROM THE CROW NEST BATTERY, SHOWING THE OBSTRUCTIONS TO PREVENT THE DESCENT OF THE REBEL RAMS, AND THE UNION MONITORS BELOW THEM.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, S. F. MULLER.

A VILLAGE MIDNIGHT.

THE night is as dark as a deed of crime,
And the clattering windblown rain
Falls fiercely fast on the rattling slates
And hammers the window pane,
While the storming whistles between the leaves
A wild and tuneless strain.

No loup is lit in the village street,
No star in the sable sky,
For darkness swathes both earth and air
In its robes of funeral dye,
And the watchdog howls by the garden bleak,
Like the banshee's hooting cry.

The lightning leaps a lifelike thing
From spout to branch of the walnut tall,
The gate creaks harsh on the rusted hinge,
Response to the screech-owl's call,
While the crisp, dead leaves in hustling haste
Rush down by the moss-blotched wall.

The clock strikes twelve in the stairway gloom,
(How true is the record it keeps),
Tick away, count on, I care not now,
For my rose-lipped Anna sleeps
Far down in the vale 'neath the beeches bare,
Where the foam-flecked river sweeps.

Oh! I love the voice of this midnight storm,
It falls on my frenzied ear
Like fairy late, and willing would I
Companion its wild career,
For my soul is tossed like its ebon-hued wings,
And I'm weary of lingering here.

A good many extraordinary objects come to the surface when the great guns of war shake the waters.

Laura Thurston's Charge.

BY CHARLES F. PRESTON.

"HAS the morning paper come, Hannah?" inquired Laura Thurston of the servant, who was removing an elegant breakfast service from the table.

"I will see, Miss Laura."

While the servant is absent on her quest we may look around us. The room is furnished with a degree of comfort amounting to luxury. Part the heavy curtains and a broad lawn stretches before you. The grounds front on an avenue lined with majestic elms. We are in one of those suburban villas to be found in such profusion in the neighborhood of our principal cities.

Laura Thurston, to whom the house and grounds belong, is no longer in her first youth, yet few are aware that she has reached her thirtieth year. She has the fair complexion which Time usually treats kindly, and might readily pass for several years younger. But the careful observer will note a thoughtful light in the clear gray eyes which speaks of a wider experience of life.

"Here is the paper, Miss Laura," said Hannah, returning with the article of which she had been in quest.

Laura Thurston opened its ample pages eagerly. The telegraph had announced on the preceding day a great battle fought on the plains of Pennsylvania. "A great victory" met the reader's gaze in staring capitals. She ran her eye eagerly over the account. On reaching a certain line the paper dropped from her hands, and her heart gave a great bound. The line was very brief. It contained these few words:

"Captain Henry Palmer, killed."

"If I could but have seen him once before he died," she murmured. "It is ten years to-day since we parted in anger. Had that moment been blotted out how different might have been both our lives!"

She sat for a few minutes in deep thought, and then, as if inspired by a sudden resolution, rang the bell.

"Hannah," she said, quickly, "I am going out of town, and may not return till this evening. It is even possible that I may be absent longer, but I shall endeavor to return to-night."

"Yes, Miss Laura."

"I may bring back some one with me," she continued, with slight hesitation. "You may light a fire this afternoon in the bedroom adjoining mine."

With a little surprise the servant withdrew. Half an hour later Laura left the house, and walking to the depot not far distant, purchased a ticket for Glenville.

A MOTHER-IN-LAW WANTED.

Arrived at the depot in Glenville she inquired of the depot master:

"Can you tell me whether Captain Palmer's children live in this village?"

"Yes, ma'am," was the reply. "They are boarding with Mr. Hiram Norcross, who keeps the store. I expect you have heard of the captain's death?"

"CAPTAIN HENRY PALMER—KILLED."

Laura inclined her head gravely.

"I am afraid the children will have a hard time of it. They haven't any near relatives, and their father will leave little or nothing. Norcross is rich enough to keep 'em for nothing, but he's too mean to think of doing it."

"Can you direct me to his house?"

"Certainly, ma'am. Do you see that yellow house at the corner?"

"Yes."

"Well, you turn there and keep straight ahead till you get to the Baptist church. The store is just opposite. You'll know it by the sign. The family live over the store."

While Laura is making her way from the station we will introduce the reader into a small sitting-room in the dwelling of Hiram Norcross. The "store-keeper" himself stands before the fire, his face wearing an expression of perplexity. He is a small man, with yellowish hair, and a large bald spot on the crown of his head. His gray coat bears marks of having been used from a remote period as a scrawper. His eyes are small and ferret-like. His wife sits near him in a wooden rocking-chair, mending a refractory stocking. She has a thin face and pinched lips, and her expression is far from agreeable.

"If people expect me to keep the children, let 'em expect," she remarked, in a doubled tone. "If their father has been kind and can't pay their board, they must go to the poorhouse. Why didn't he get his life insured?"

"I agree with you entirely, my dear," said Hiram Norcross, who was quite as mean as his wife, but not so indifferent to public opinion; "I don't know but what he'd better keep 'em, say a week. If we send them off too soon, people may go to the other store, and that would prove a serious loss."

"There's ten week's board that hasn't been paid for now," said Mrs. Norcross, sharply.

"So there has," said her husband, uneasily.

"And whether it'll ever be paid, goodness knows."

"No doubt the cash'en has left something. Whatever it is 'll be sent home, and we have the first claim."

"At any rate I'm not in favor of increasing it. It's best to notify the sales' men to take charge of the children at once. We've done our duty."

"I don't know but you're right, Jane. I guess I'll go over and speak to Squire Houghton. He's the chairman."

At this moment the door-bell rang, and almost immediately a shatterly girl made her appearance at the door, and said:

"There's a lady in the parlor wants to see you, Miss Jones."

Mrs. Norcross dropped her stocking, and taking her spectacles down.

"Mrs. Norcross, I believe," said Laura Thurston, rising.

The lady made a stiff inclination.

"I understand that the children of Capt. Palmer are boarding with you."

"Yes," said Mrs. Norcross, deliberately. "They've been boarding with me, but I don't expect I shall be able to accommodate them any longer."

"Have they been told of their father's death?"

"Not yet. We've only just heard of it."

"What are their ages?"

"Henry's nine and Laura five."

"Laura!" said the visitor, starting. "I—I thought her name was different."

"No, she hasn't always."

"I suppose Capt. Palmer did not leave much property?"

"No, I don't expect he left a cent. Ten weeks board is due for the children, but I s'pose Mr. Norcross will have to lose it. He's hard to slave from morning till night, and then not get anything for it. I expect some of the neighbors will be expecting us to keep 'em for nothing? Folks is just so unreasonable. I'm sure Mr. Norcross and I would speak to the parchoose if we thing away our money that way."

An expression of disgust swept over Laura's face.

"What is the amount of the bill?" she asked, coldly.

"We've been asking six dollars a week for the two. Ten weeks' will make exactly sixty dollars."

"You need feel under no concern as to the payment of the bill," said Laura, quietly. "You have only to make it out, and I will settle it at once."

"Are you related to the children?' asked Mrs. Norcross, surprise mingling with her gratification.

"I am not," said Laura, "but their father was a friend of mine. Since they appear to be unprovided with a home, I will take charge of them, if there is no objection."

"No objection at all," said Mrs. Norcross, briskly. I'm glad they're likely to have a home.

"Can you get them ready at once? I should like to take them with me to-day."

"They can be ready in an hour. Only some of their clothes are in the wash."

"You can send them by express at your convenience."

"Good riddance to them!" thought Mrs. Norcross, as she left the room. "Now people can't find fault with us. The bill's paid too. We're pretty lucky."

When the intelligence was communicated to Hiram Norcross he rubbed his hands with glee, and lest no time in making out a bill for the children's board.

Henry and Laura were brought into the sitting-room. They seemed instinctively drawn to Laura Thurston, and were soon on as intimate terms as if they had been acquainted for years. Laura, too, fairly bristled, attracted by them in a manner which surprised her. In the frank, open brow and clear eyes of the boy she recognised a striking resemblance to the father—a resemblance which excited in her a degree of pleasure not unmingled with pain.

"Will you come again soon?" asked the little girl, climbing into the lap of her namesake.

"No, I think not."

"Oh, I'm so sorry," said the child, regretfully.

"And why are you sorry?"

"Because I like you."

"How would you like to come and live with me?"

"And not stay here any longer?" asked the child, eagerly.

"No."

"Would Mrs. Norcross let me? Would papa be willing?"

"Mrs. Norcross has consented," said Laura, evading the last query. "And you, Henry?" she asked, turning to the boy.

"I should like to live with you much better than with Mrs. Norcross," he said, frankly.

"Then," said Laura, "it shall be as you wish. If you will go to Mrs. Norcross she will get you ready, and we will start by the next train."

Hannah's astonishment was extreme when her mistress returned with the children. Laura explained, briefly, that their father was dead, and she was their guardian.

Now commenced a new life for the children. Miss Thurston constituted herself their teacher. It was to her a source of the greatest enjoyment to train these young minds, which she perceived to be full of promise. The days were no longer leaden-footed, but fled apace. A new world of thought and action, a new sphere of duty and responsibility were opened to her. Nor was it little that her affections, which were naturally warm, had found objects on which they might be bestowed. At first the children were dear to her for their father's sake; Henry, for the clear eyes through which his father seemed looking at her; Laura, because her name occasionally suggested that father continued to commune with herself. But the children soon became dear for their own sake. Laura felt that she had entered upon a new life. Her wealth enabled her to command all the advantages which were available for them. Fortunately she had no near relatives to complain of the manner in which she chose to dispose of her money.

One day Henry was reciting a lesson in geography, and was on the point of giving the boundaries of Africa, when Hannah entered the room with the intelligence that a gentleman was below.

"Do you know who it is?" asked Laura.

"No, Miss Laura."

"Did he give you no card?"

"No. He only said he would like to see you."

"Very well. You may tell him. I will be down directly. Henry, we will defer your recitation for a short time. You may look over your spelling now."

Five minutes later Laura descended to the drawing-room. In the obscure light she did not at first distinguish her visitor. He rose and came forward. A man of middle age, with fine features, but pale and thin, evidently the effect of recent sickness.

Laura looked at him inquiringly. Not a suspicion of the truth dawned upon her mind.

"Don't you know me, Laura—Miss Thurston?" he asked in a low voice.

"Captain Palmer!" she exclaimed, with sudden conviction. "I thought—"

"You thought me dead; I was so reported, but it was a mistake. I fell into the hands of the rebels, and they have kept me till this time. As soon as I could I wrote to Mr. Norcross, but he did not see fit to communicate the fact to you; when I called on him yesterday, he expressed his joy with your disinterested kindness to my children. How can I ever thank you, Laura?"

He took her hand in a tender, respectful manner.

"Do not speak of it," she said, hurriedly. "I felt that there was some atonement due to you for the past."

"Have you, too, regretted it, Laura?" asked Captain Palmer, with subdued eagerness.

"I have ever ceased to do so. But let us not speak of this. The children are upstairs; when they have been properly informed of your return, they will be overjoyed to see you."

It is needless to relate with what rapture the children greeted their father, whom they supposed to be dead. Laura, from a little distance, watched with happy eyes this meeting, in which she seemed to feel a personal interest.

Captain Palmer obtained a hearing-place near by, but spent almost every day in the society of Laura and the children. Day by day his step became more firm, his cheek assumed a more healthful color. But a few days' furlough was given to recruit his exhausted strength neared a close. One day, sitting in his armchair, with Laura near him, he said suddenly:

"Ought I to burden you with the children while I am again absent?"

"I shall feel that, in so doing, you are giving me the greatest proof of your confidence and esteem."

"You are willing to be troubled with them?"

"Their presence is my greatest enjoyment."

"Would you be willing to take charge of their father, also, Miss Laura?" he asked.

She looked up suddenly, and her lips half parted, but she said nothing.

"My children shall plead my cause. Henry—Laura—I have asked Miss Thurston to become your second mother, help me to persuade her."

Laura looked from the pale, eager face of the children, and she silently placed her hand in his.

"Let the dead past bury its dead," he said, in a low voice. "Henceforth we live only in the glad present."

They were quietly married on the day before Captain Palmer's return to service, and now Laura feels that she has a rightful claim to the children, of which she undertook the charge for their father's sake.

LIFE.

Life is a river, flowing to the sea,
Through fields of emerald green and flowery lea;
Yet oft its course o'er rocks and sand may be.

Life is a vessel sailing to a haven
Of peace and joy and happiness in Heaven;
Yet oft the barque by angry wind is driven.

Life is a poem, a sweet symphony,
A concord pure, a pleasing harmony;
Sometimes, alas! a low, sad threnody.

Let us with pleasure each good fortune greet,
With fortitude each adverse current meet;
Accept, with trust, the hither with the sweet.

Wolf:

AN HISTORICAL STORY.

(A good deal after the manner of some "Historical Novel" we have.)

BY A. F. BANKS.

It was a lovely evening in the autumn of the year when the good Queen Anne ascended the English throne.

Seated on the new mown hay were a couple of youthful lovers. The one, a strapping lad about seventeen; the other, a blooming country girl of maybe three years younger, still, with a developed womanly air about her.

From the distressed look of the boy, and the overflowing eyes of his companion, it was evident that the subject of their communings was a painful one; two young hearts were undergoing their first real trial of worldly tribulation.

John Turner, owing to the sudden death, considerably involved, of his only remaining parent, a worthy farmer, was about to leave the village, and the Hebe of his butterfly days, to seek a livelihood in the great metropolis.

Bred, as he had been, to agricultural pursuits, and being much liked in his neighborhood, it would not have been difficult for him to have procured employment; but Johnny was that peculiar something in his heart which prompts to a higher, though maybe not happier, career, than the one bestowed by peaceful toil in the forest and meadows.

His future was indistinct, even to his thoughts; but that future was not clouded. No! it was the dazzling rays of the gorgeous sun of hope alone which rendered it indistinct. The soul bounded for a giant tussle with its fellow-souls, and he determined to go to London.

Sally Barnes was an orphan, and for the last six years had been the companion of old Mrs. Byers, her grandmother, a good old soul, but unfortunately very poor. Nevertheless, they get along very happily together, and it was a curious sight, when times were hard, to see them, to hear these two talk over their position; the child, early inured to struggle, was as much a woman as her elder, with the exception that the old lady had learned to despair, a word as yet not introduced into the vocabulary of the blythe and hopeful Sally.

Often, too, would young John Turner drop in, generally bringing in his pocket some little treat he odd a zest to their homely supper. The poor have few luxuries, and a treat to be wondered at that the heart of the guileless girl yearned towards the frank, kindly lad. Love, health and hope—the Graces of the cottage poor.

It was a heavy parting. As a remembrancer—as though a spur to remembrance in the shape of a gift were required by hearts bound by vows and prospect!—John left Sally his companion, Wolf, a splendid young dog of a curious breed found still in the middle and southern parts of France, but extinct, or nearly so, in England.

The name Wolf was a most appropriate one, for of the entire breed yclept the "wolf dog," from their remarkable resemblance to that animal, none had a more decidedly wolfish look than John Turner's four-footed friend. As he pointed to his young master's heels, as a hint to remain and "watch her well," the sagacious, well-trained dog cocked his head and wagged his tail, as though he thoroughly understood the matter in all it bearings, and, distinctly, that special vow never to desert his gentle trust. As his master with a bursting heart trudged off on his journey in life, the dog sat looking after him, but on Sally admonishing hand reminded him of his new duties, and he returned to lick away the gentle tears which furrowed the cheeks of poor lonely Sally.

Four years had rolled on. For the last eighteen months no tidings whatever had reached the village concerning the rover. One sad morning poor Sally found herself alone in the world. Her worthy grandame died, and with her she expired the very slender annuity which, with the aid of sundry odd jobs of needlework, had helped to support them.

Sally, although proffered employment by the principal milliner of the village, determined to go to London. Old Bob Jones, the carrier, at this, and propheseid a "a bad end" for her. But they knew not the great invention which impelled that young girl thus to confront the perils of a city.

In spite of Sally's efforts to hoard, hear by hear, wandered those many streets in search of her early love. So she made up her small bundle, secured her little box, and one early autumn day her person, tied her handkerchief over her head, and, accompanied by her faithful Wolf, started for her destination.

Without meeting with any particular adventure or serious molestation, she arrived in London, after about a month's travel, having made various sojourns of a few days here in her ailing, which happily fell in her way at some of the farmhouses where she stopped for rest or shelter.

[I would commend the idea of a "traveling milliner" to our Yankee girls; it is a new field and might raise a fair crop.]

She put up at a small, cleanly roadside hotel, in the outskirts of the city, and, by a piece of good fortune, the landlady, a buxom, merry-hearted body, upon learning her trade, informed her that she had quite a number of neglected mourning, lace, and the like, including a brand-new churchgoing dress to make. Sally acquitted herself so satisfactorily that Mrs. Molby suggested that she should take one of her cheapest rooms and establish herself as a milliner in that neighborhood, and that she would support all her influence among her friends to procure her work. The poor girl received this offer with delight and gratitude, and in a short period not only found herself the possessor of quite a little purse, but beloved and respected by every one who knew her. Early struggle either has a good or a bad effect upon its victim: it had rendered Sally kind and lenient.

One day, about two months after her location here, she suffered a sad misery. Her faithful old Wolf, who had been extensive and successive acquaintance, both canine and biped, was nowhere to be found. Enemies he had none, therefore it was not from the dog's mind to search in the nearest pond; and it was a well-established fact, based upon numerous experiments, that even mutton-chops had no power to seduce his allegiance from his mistress.

The crier was sent round, but could learn no tidings, and a number of good-looking, sanguine young gentlemen, nervously anxious to be of service to Miss Barnes, scoured the country and town with a like fruitless result. Serious dark surmises began to be hinted about dogstealers and a trip to foreign parts, when one morning Mrs. Melby received a letter. Her honest eye glistened as she saw the superscription and broke the seal. It was from an old lodger of hers, one on whom she dotted as though he was her own child.

He informed her that, having been in that neighborhood a few days ago on a hasty commission, which prevented him from calling to see his dear old landlady (so he wrote), he had been startled by being, as he at first thought, attacked by a monster dog, which sprang clear at him. In a moment, however, he found that it was but the rough, hearty, overjoyed recognition of one who had mutated him into the mysteries of bread and milk from a saucer, as well as superintending his youthful education generally.

It was Wolf! who, dogfike, wasn't disposed, thenceforward, to abandon his old friend, even at the risk of offending the new.

[Now, my dear reader, do not unjustly endeavor to establish any more consanguinity with the canine race among your enemies.]

John Turner, convinced in his own mind that Wolf could never have deserted his colors except in his own favor, felt assured that the sweet girl of his yet constant dreamings must be somewhere near, and besought Mrs. Melby to use every exertion to discover the whereabouts of the owner of Wolf, as in his guide of dog physiognomy, he was assured that such a superb animal would not be lost without anxious inquiry.

Breathless did Sally listen to this letter, and a big tear came into the good old landlady's eye as she was made the depository of the secret of a young girl's affections.

"Won't we astonish his weak nerves!" exclaimed Mrs. Melby, bustling about, and ordering her little pony-chaise round instanter.

"Poor John Turner!" she, as she put on her bonet; "he'll kill himself with those musty books. Why won't he take to summut more practical like?"

John, arrived in London, had endeavored to procure employment in the same occupation as that in his hopes. Every avenue was closed to one poor and without recommendation. He had at last got employment in a menial capacity, and had taken lodgings at Mrs. Melby's. He was very very, very sanity, but he paid his little hill honorably, and by his gentleness had endeared himself to all in the house. He was ready out after his work was over, and Mrs. Melby soon discovered that the cause of his sunken eye and haggard appearance every morning was that he set up reading till two o'clock in the morning.

Now came a disaster. His master failed and he was thrown out of employment. But his former good conduct had won him a new place of bread. He taught the children and did all sorts of little writings and commissions. These, however, only barely supported him, but Mrs. Melby stuck to him and cheered him on.

It was perhaps a feeling of independence which one morning prompted him to leave the house of his benefactress. He left her a letter thanking her gratefully for her kindness; he said that he owed her much—much more that could be repaid in a mere pecuniary point of view; and proud as when he had succeeded—ignis fatuus of a world!—to return and live with her; at present he was ashamed to be only recipient of favors.

The old lady rifled up indignantly at first perusal of this letter, but upon consideration she acknowledged to herself her pet's right, and although his absence cost her some honest-hearted tears, his step rendered him quite a hero in her estimation.

They found John in a dirty room scattered all over with books and scraps of paper. Great was the astonishment, bliss, of all parties. Wolf certainly heeded little the astonishment of the latter on their entrance, but the next he had evidently made up his mind to put the best possible face on the matter and thereby, and, as much as such a decidedly friendly demonstration in the dresses of the visitors as to cause Mrs. Melby to exclaim more energetically than ever, "Drat the dog!"

It was no use in Wolf trying to disguise his position; his coat and his check told the story too plainly. In spite of his expostulations, the poor, proud lad was forced to disguise, had as wine-passenger, to say nothing of nearly a hundred weight of books and "such truck" as the old woman contemptuously styled "thoughts buried, &c., &c.

The remainder of the story may be shortly told. The old love regraping in the hearts of the young couple, stronger even than of yore. John at last listened to his landlady's advice, and determined upon doing something "practical like." He commenced doing so in the right way. He married Sally. Then, with the assistance of Mrs. Melby, he set up a small haberdashery store, part of the establishment being set apart for the continuation of the millinery business. Prosperity seemed to take a pleasure in smiling upon their sunny countenances, and in a few years the millinery business was abandoned, and John Turner became a merchant.

Success followed him in his new career, and in a few years more he was one of the most highly respected of the merchant princes of the world.

In the year 1728 he was elected Lord Mayor of London, and as he and his partner, Sally, accompanied by the overjoyed Mrs. Melby, now a silver-haired woman, proceeded in the gorgeous carriage provided by the city for such occasions, on a formal visit to their Sovereign at Windsor Castle, the truthful pair looked into one another's eyes, and felt that there was above who would not suffer honest merit to struggle in vain.

Old Wolf had died honored and respected years before, leaving behind him a promiscuous posterity, which will hark and persecute through endless generations.

TO FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

BY THOMAS POWELL.

ENGLAND was ever famed for Nightingales,
Singing at evening in her leafy lanes,
And charming lovers with their dulcet strains,
Adding a music to love's gentle tales!
Haunter of sylvan dells and leafy dales,
Oft, too, thou'st soothed the poet's thoughtful pains;
But holier far to cheer the dying bed,
And be the angel that sometimes is given
To pilot the spirits as they cross Heaven,
Just as the consciousness of earth has fled.
Winged voices that enchant the quiet vales,
Deem not thou'rt wronged, when, by the world
As said
That the one Nightingale most dear to fame
Is she who joins sweet Florence to her name.

TOM DASHER,

The Man who Married on Phrenological Principles.

BY JOHN BYERS.

TOM DASHER and I were college chums. Tom's studying was deeper and closer than mine: he lived in the exact sciences, in theology and moral philosophy, and I skimmed more on the surface, having a preference for the modern languages and belles lettres—calling myself a student in English literature. Tom worshipped the philosophers, I the poets; and we lived together at the shrine of Mamma. Tom looked to wit and humor as sauces for the "solids"—so did I. We took upon ourselves the dignity of sophs at the same time, and when we took up the higher mathematics Tom commenced with the Latin—as usual—but I jumped out into up French, without knowing one word of the dead —network binding the frowns of the faculty. Although we differed somewhat in our tastes as to studies, we were of the same warm social natures. Tom liked a glass of punch, I did too; and, to use a college phrase, "we looked well behind our pipes."

During the intervals of study we used to converse on our favorite themes, and in pursuing this conversation was almost as beneficial to us as poring over our books. We found that it enlarged our ideas, made us liberal-minded, and gave us inclinations to look charitably on what the hastily-judging world often censured.

We frequently consumed over a glass of punch —we never indulged in more than one at a time, and Tom said that he could talk as well with punch as without it; "besides, it leaks so social, Harry."

"Ah, yes, Tom; and your metaphysical remarks lose their dryness by contrast."

In verbo sacerdos. Tom used to say that if there was anything he preferred next to his books it was a home of his own; he assumed me that the addition of a wife to his personal property would enhance its value beyond calculation. Tom had a competency, I hadn't. Tom could marry when he saw fit, I had to wait awhile.

When our class graduated I delivered the "salutatory," and Tom took the highest order of all—he was Valedictorian. So we bade farewell to our fostering mother together, Tom to pursue his metaphysical researches at Laurel Ledge, and remain her co-operator to its goodly acres; and I to take a position under the government in the East India civil service.

I was in India three years, and heard from Tom twice in that time; he mentioned nothing about being married, but spoke more enthusiastic and "heavy" articles to one of the quarterlies. As I said, I remained in India three years, and then a longing for home, together with the unsuitableness of climate, caused me to resign and seek the pleasanter air of my native England.

A few days after my arrival at home I mailed a short note to Tom telling him of my return, and when he might expect me at the Ledge. This was his answer:

"LAUREL LODGE, Jan. 30, 18—.

"MY DEAR HARRY—I am delighted, my dear old friend, to know that you are at home again. Will it be convenient for me to receive you? How could you spoil your note by such a query? An old friend like you should know no better. Come, my dear fellow, as you value my friendship. come instanter. I see that you have your old lack of confidence—I know it by your sentences; just as destructiveness is not interfered, for you consumed only half a sheet of note-paper. Your Order is not so good as formerly, you know! Your pen must have wrong end up and on the wrong corner of your stationery. But do not give it up, my boy; keep wandering, Harry. Come to-morrow without fail. I will ride down to the station for you, and as I know you look well with a horse under you I shall have Bess, the black filly, along. Of your especial convenience, I expect you to make Jessie Hall of Lansdale, Bess; we shall talk over our punch as we used to of yore. I have some game shall be glad to have your Alimentiveness. Your affectionate friend,

"THOMAS DASHER."

This letter pleased me, yet some parts of it staggered me somewhat. Sundry words commencing with capitals looked strange—to be sure I knew the meaning of them, but Tom seemed to use them queerly.

I missed the ride on "Bess, the black filly," on account of the train delayed me one day, and when I arrived at Laurel station I had to walk to the Ledge.

as the person who answered my summons at the door I recognised the old home-keeper.

"She was glad to see Master Harry. The old master and the young ladies were away in London. The young master was at home, but he was clean daft, gone crached altogether. Nothing was of no account to him, except an outlandish thing he called free—no—heezy. And if you'd see the skulls and bones he's hin a gatherin', and hear him talk about combativeness; and—but, dearme, his father says he's a loon, and if I could say what I—"

Hush! for my perplexed ears Tom appeared at this juncture, and I received a warm welcome. He was not content with one hand but had to shake both, and they received the hearty pressure of true friendship. So far my reception was "unasked," he had more of the intellectual and cultivated cast than when we were students. His face was thoughtful, but oh, how it warmed up when he smiled!

Study and application had furrowed a line here and there, but furrows were honors, the scars of the conflict. His carriage was erect, although his head inclined slightly forward; his hair was brushed easily back off his ample and well-marked forehead, and his eye was as clear and as strong as an eagle's.

We lacked arms in our old friendly way, as we walked through the shrubbery of the Ledge on our road to Tom's room, where we used to sit and talk when I visited him during college vacations, or, as he called them, "the grind and plug, kindly granted by our Alma Mater."

"There, my ancient," said he, as he opened the door and ushered me on ahead of him to the hall, "there is our old den, and a man with your Locality should not fail to recognise every mouse hole, and that echo which I think was here at your last visit. I have added a lit to human knowledge, I consider its occupant a resident graduate. He is an elderly spider, but I call him young Euclid, because he invents more and more every week of that web of his than a mathematician could solve in a lifetime."

"But let me get a good look at you, Harry. Three years have not altered you much; your vital temperament is hardly as strong as formerly, you have been accustomed to eat for mental, using steam without a proper supply of fuel. Your phrenism is bad, my boy, you have been too sedentary; had your Inhabitiveness been weaker you would not have left India to seek your fortune, but would have up too strong an average for a rambler. There's a great deal expressed in those well-cuffs of yours, Harry; and those tall, stovepipe hats are not the ordinary amount of the language pewer. Your face is as open and honest as ever it was (there's the old approbativeness), and there's no want of charitableness and benevolence in you."

"But, my dear Tom," interrupted I, anxious for a reply, "for the sake of my poor unedified brain, do tell me what you are trying to inflict upon me?"

Tom laughed in his old hearty way, and then explained to me how he had become interested in the science of phrenology. He rattled away quite eloquently on his new theme, and I gradually began to understand the principles of the different divisions. I had heard of the science before, but like many another, had given it merely a thought en passant. I had not the time, or what it intended to teach, but had never devoted a moment to its study, or even given it a careful reading, so I was puzzled with its technicalities. Tom went off to get hot water, and I amused myself by glancing around the "den." The venerable young Euclid was not visible; his last problem must have been too intricate, for he was no doubt busy on it in bed, and I concluded that he had retired to his cell to think out something astonishing. In the corner opposite to him one segment of his spider was a bookcase with glass doors, and on the upper shelves were arranged some skulls, bones and other casts. One skull particularly attracted my attention particularly, because the forehead looked as if a policeman's club had come in contact with it, and made a hollow fairly across it. It was labelled as follows: "Case of destructiveness." Notice the absence of Veneration and Benevolence, and a general lowness in the rest of the moral group. The perceptive faculties are also limited, the reflectives; the selfish organs predominate over all; the width at the ears is immense; and Amativeness shows a development only in that part which prompts the grosser instincts."

There was a wonderful difference between the shape of this skull and that of the one next to it, which was labelled: "The skull of Napoleon Bonaparte at Waterloo. He was a professing Christian, a thorough soldier, a tender nurse to a wounded comrade, and a devoted friend. He had a blind sort of courage and woman's tenderness. Notice what a fulness Benevolence gives to the arch of the forehead, and the hollow above it. Time and death will note how well all the moral and refining faculties are developed. Destructiveness and Combativeness are large, but they are strongly checked by the domestic faculties are all strong, and the forehead is well marked."

I had scarcely time to read this when Tom came in, and I was the line from Hamlet:

"Alas! poor Yorick! I knew him ——"

The sight of the name instantly called to my mind Yorick, the pointer dog, who used to raise the game for Tom and I to shoot over in vacations. Works on phrenology occupied the lower shelf, and it was while I was deeply absorbed in one of Combe's lectures that Tom addressed me:

"Ah," said he, "I see you are surveying my cabinet. That simple little collection is as great a terror to the females of the household as some political cabinets are to the weak. Even their fanatica confesses his timidity, and the housekeeper declares the room to be haunted; but it is never haunted by ghosts, only by the spirits of Harry, it won't lose its prestige. But here's the punch, my boy, so let us draw our chair up to the grate, and see what kind of spirits haunt the goblets."

We got close to the cheerful fire, sipped our punch, and talked away in our old style. Tom could not keep from his phrenological hobby. So much did he wish to enlarge on it, that it was only with a great deal of interrupting on my part that I got information as to the health of his family, old friends, &c.

"But, Tom," said I, as we put away our cryptglobets, having want our measure, "you do not seem to have taken the honors of a Benedict upon you yet. You need to dose as much on the happiness of possessing a wife as do now on phrenology, and still you lack the 'valuable addition' you used to talk about."

"Ah, Harry, I would have no trouble in getting the addition you mention, but to get the proper kind—there's the rub. I've lost none of my desire to enter the married state, and could have gratified my wishes fifty times since I saw you last; but I am determined to never marry unless I can do so on phrenological principles."

"Oh, tosh, Tom; you surely do not intend to apply a phrenological plaster to marrying?"

"Certainly, my boy, I apply it to everything in life. Ah, Harry, Harry, a student of human nature lately, a close one, too; and my new science has been my tutor, with observation for a helper. I look on ladies as a great book composed of two great divisions: the first called Man, and the second Woman, and their virtues and vices, feelings and failings make up the chapters. He who would study each character closely would find work for a lifetime, and if he had the proper inclination he would find the study a pleasure. 'Authors live in a world apart from other men'—so do students of human nature. In such a person as myself they see a chapter of the great book; they can read their sex; and their characteristics and oddities they easily account for, while the 'unlettered' wonder what caused them. I have paid a great deal of attention to the second division, I have given it a close scrutiny, and find my ideas of woman now to be much clearer than they ever were. I have had many another I used to look for attractive faces, gay dispositions and winning manners, never thinking that these were the qualities of head and heart that are the distinguishing traits of a true woman. Ah, Harry, how many men and women there are who, to a phrenologist, on the surface, who, when they marry, find that they have taken upon themselves more of life's miseries! This is too often the case, and results from the haphazard manner in which we choose our helpmates. In fact, some make no choice whatever—they go, they see, and they are conquered, and many another has to do the same with complete the programme. The poet spoke truly when he said: 'Women are the angels of our homes.' The phrenologist, however, adds no echo to my heart, and I am sure it does in your own—a woman is indeed an earth angel when she possesses the qualities of true womanhood. But how many exceptions we find to the rule. Did you ever read the novel, 'John Halifax, Gentleman?' Yes. Well, I often thought that Dreuda was an angel, but I now think that Ursula and I have fancied, too, that I would like just such a woman for a wife, although, indeed, she had a little too much of the 'old Adam' in her to suit me. Many and ardent nature—many and many a time have I wished that I could tear away the veil of fiction that hides such a book, and pronounce the characters real. Harry, I am become thoroughly disgusted with the women I meet when 'out.' Simpering, affected things they are, with a lot of nonsense in their heads as wide as the Sut smile or favor is worth a kingdom. If a man cannot dance or sing or 'play' he may hide his head in shame. I am looking for the man who can only boast of his brains, and who likes a quiet corner and a chat, may as well put his brains in his pocket. I am looking for that type of woman who can converse beyond the small talk of society, but can use his heels to perfection is held in far greater estimation. I am sick to death of dress me and charitible when I say that I believe that the more a woman mingles in society the more she loses that womanly, domestic nature is gradually effaced; her finer feelings become blunted, and the home altar which she should make sacred is the victim of its chief ornaments. I think also that some even of the best do too much upon themselves—they imagine they are petty tyrants, that they can say to this one 'go,' and he goeth, and to that one 'come,' and he cometh; and that is also that they have the privilege of dealing their cutting remarks and their censures and sympathies indiscriminately among their acquaintance friends, believing them 'too gallant' to retaliate. Do not think me harsh in my remarks, Harry; no one knows better than you do; I know that I am a man's place to woo, and hers to be won, but I do not like to see her taking too much for granted. I do not wish her modernize mingling in society to be timorous either; but I wish to impress on you that the gay frequenter of society will never make such a wife as the one whose chief pride is her home. And when that home circle is a true circle, pleasure will never be merely tangent to it—it will be sure to cut the circumference. I think I said either that I was looking for a model wife, some gem of perfection—ah, no; I believe that looking for too much perfection is folly. Perfection is not to be had—I do not imagine that I believe in affinities. The woman who is not spoiled by the affectations of the world, who has cultivated her mind, improved her sentiments and a reverence for that which should be venerated, who has congeniality of temper, which overcomes all opposition, and that amount of domestic quality that makes home and its associations paramount to all else, such a woman I take for a wife; and if I married such a one I should be supremely happy. Phrenology and its because I would be taking for a partner's woman corresponding phrenologically to my nature. And there you have my ideas to be found, and—but, Harry, I am getting tiresome, perhaps, and we will let the subject drop for the present. I could much enlarge more on it, for it is one of vital importance, but I might weary you—ah, there's the tea bell. We both like the pleasures of the cuisine, so let us adjourn to the dining-room, and you can tell some of your old stories with which you were wont to set the table in a roar."

"Well, my boy, Tom old mystery, and on phrenological principles, too—at least he says so, and of course he knows. Along with the cards he sent me a short note, which wound up in this way:

"She's the daughter of a clergyman, Harry, not equal to me in "station" (I dislike to write that word, but I find it), and plain-featured; but you know, old friend, that I never would compare faces and purses with head and heart. But that is not the question you must be at the wedding. Do not disappoint

"Yours affectionately,

"THOMAS DASHER."

When I saw Tom's betrothed I was pleased beyond measure. I knew nothing about "human nature" or any of Tom's "ologies," but "that dear piece of humanity" as Tom sometimes calls her now seemed, to my untutored judgment, just such a woman as I could lavish my whole love upon. Tom said she was plain, but I think her more than that. To be sure, she was not positively handsome, but she had

"That homely grace that makes the plain seem fair."

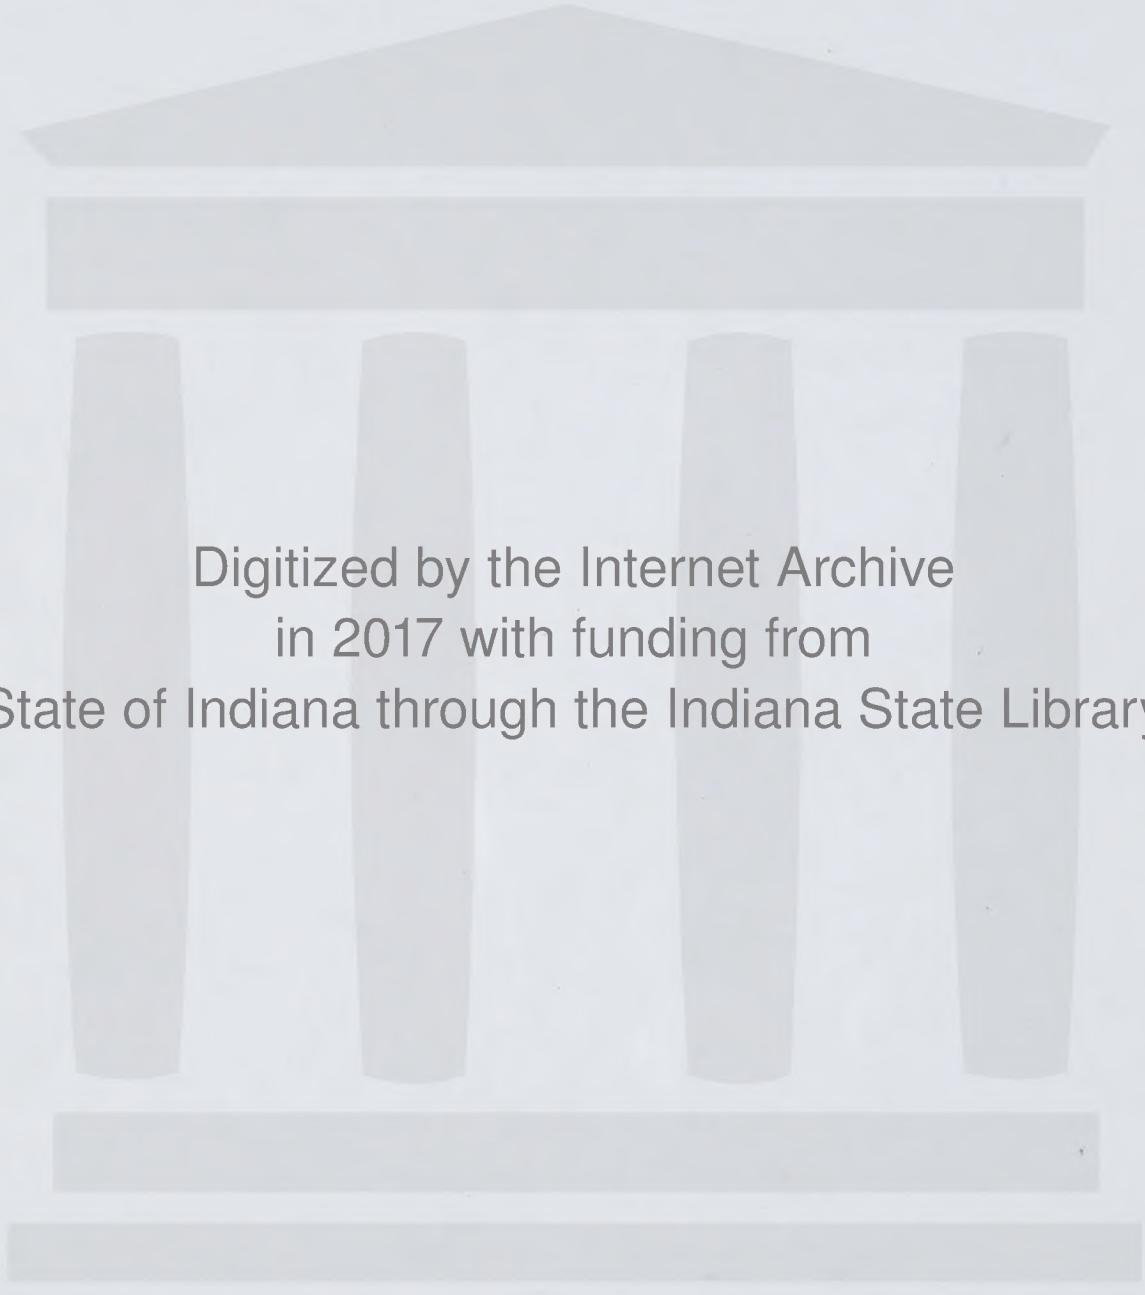
Her head was large and well-shaped, her forehead was ample, and her rich brown hair fell off in pretty waves at each side; her blue eyes were large and expressive, and seemed to me to have the "love-light" in them; her lips were full, and what sane would call "pouting"—just such a pair of lips as one would wish to kiss; and her chin was well-sized and rounded, while her other features were perfectly regular. There was a refinishing expression on her face, a kind of modest sweetness, a sweetness that only the best of the world could not see, but which would recommend her to those who could perceive true beauty. Her head just peeped over Tom's left shoulder when they stood up together; and when he led her to the dance hung on his arm—not in the fashionable-ought-to-be-ashamed-of-that-style, but because she was close to his side, leaning heavily, in that trusting way that only a woman can show. She was a belle, as I found out by her partners' list, and nearly form that supported her contained as happy and noble a heart as ever God blessed a man with. I made due allowance for Tom's exaltations, his married life is all he could wish it to be. I should know, for I am often at the Ledge, notes to "Dear Tom" are as plenty as ever they were, and Mary —that's her name—is always pleased to see me, because Tom calls me his brother.

Tom's father died soon after the wedding, and both his sisters married—Sarah, as she is now, to Lady Alice to himself—and Mary. They have a little world of their own; she won't let him write much, for she says it is while he pores at a semblance to the review, just to keep his hand in. She has been more than a brother to me; he set me down as a genius upon accepting my first sapling along famously. Taking all things into consideration, I think I shall marry. Tom says there's nothing like it, and of course Tom knows. Besides, I know a nice little lady who I think may be just the person to help me to transcribe a home circle. Some say she is, and I would take Tom's opinion sooner than my own. I often wish that I don't laugh if I don't know anything about phrenology—I often wonder if I should marry this little lady, would I be as keen on phrenological principles. I think I'll ask Tom.

INDIAN WAR ON THE WESTERN FRONTIER.

FROM the British boundary to that of Mexico the Indians are in arms. The California overland mail has been stopped, and the Mexican mail soon follow. The Indians are often led by white men, who know the supprovision train, and the finest modern rifles. All this is the result of the Sioux outbreak, the western points to rebel instigation. The Indians were from the very outset approached by the rebels with offers; and Albert Pike, the rebel chief, we know, aided in exciting the Indians to desolate our frontier.

The Indian outbreak in Minnesota, Sully, the latest Father Dessemet sent as peace commissioner, and urged a peace with the Sioux. He evidently saw tokens of approaching trouble, and would have left Minnesota to detach the Sioux from any combination. His plan was frustrated by Indian duplicity.



The war is now raging furiously. On the 20th of July the Indians attacked the Sioux City and Pacific at numerous number. Immediately after this the Indians appeared in Minnesota, and also in the territories of Kansas and Nebraska. During the past month of August the Indians have been on the warpath in Kansas and other powerful tribes in the region of Fort Laramie have joined in the war. Women and children were taken prisoners. The women dropped their children by the wayside, and when the United States forces in pursuit of the enemy captured an Indian village they reached the bluffs and our men turned back.

At Gilman's ranch, on the west of Kearney, six men were slaughtered, and another escaped to tell the tale. Another party, never heard from after seven wagons, six men, two women and four little children, left Fort Kearney. They stood mute up to the train, made signs and uttered sounds that were not understood by the whites. While the white men were cooking for them they were fired upon, the men killed, and the women and children carried; one of the children was shot because it became troublesome.

At Plumbe ranch 17 men and one woman and child were killed and the station burned. Within a half a dozen more like the work of guerrilla than that of Indians. At Cottonwood, on the Little Blue, Major Sharpe, a brave fellow, was at Liberty Farms, just 6 from Independence, when the Indians appeared in force about noon, some 40 in number, saw him, and sent three of their party to call him off. When he saw them they were close upon him. He ran the gauntlet, discharging his revolver as he went, and got to the house where they fired at him. His arm was exposed by holding on to the door post, and he received a ball which passed through it, above his elbow, but escaped. The Indian whom he shot was killed. One man was pierced with 30 arrows while at work in his field.

Those who have not seen the deadly bow and arrow, but many of them the best of arms, prove and murderous, and the Indians are practiced in using them aided what was thought to be a ruse, but when the white man had reached it he found he carried up a white man with real hair. It is evident, and is generally believed, that the whole allies of guerilla experience are leading these confederacies in their work of devastation and slaughter.

In one place the Indians drove off a large number of cattle, and the Kansas militia, with some U. S. volunteers, started out to recover them. They were, however, attacked by the Indians, several thousand in number, who surrounded them, driving them, which cut down the soldiers long before the latter could get near enough to use their own weapons. A retreat followed, and the soldiers were pursued ten miles from the field by the Indians.

I.

Upon my dreams
A shape of mystery and delight he rose,
As spring beams forth on Polar seas and snows,
Girdled with summer gleams.

With silent feet he came,
And radiant, awful eyes—a king, a god,
Piercing the dark wherein my soul abode,
With shafts of subtle flame.

All peace and joy,
All dear delights—all Heaven lay in his glance,
Shone on his lip—beamed from his countenance,
Without this world's alloy.

What marvel if I knelt!
Turning from storm, and cold, and shapes of gloom
To him who walked untainted by the doom
That blighted all I felt.

And then I saw from far
My old-time heroes, gods and men sublime,
Gaze, darkly frowning, down the halls of Time
To my bright morning star.

In beauteous scorn he smiled,
And sudden light kist earth, sea, air and heaven,
That single smile all mists of woe had riven,
All doubts beguiled.

And low and clear
His accents, thrilling as the murmurs won
From Memnon smitten by the morning sun,
Fell on my charmèd ear.

"Hast thou no glance,
No smile, no flush of joy, to greet thy fate?
Or have I come, my sweet, too late—too late
To break thy sorrow's trance?"

"No, best beloved, no!"
He kissed the words from off my pallid mouth
That reddened as the rose, when from the south
The winds of sweetness blow.

II.

Here, choked with dust, I lie.
Look up, my soul! The planets burn,
Above the earth the heavens yearn,
The nightwinds moan and sigh.

Oh, woe is me!
This night and blankness—lost—forlorn!
No more the blissful light of morn
My tear-dimmed eyes shall see.

He was no god!
Yet now I think I do him wrong;
The night is dark, the way is long
My weary feet have trod.

The cruel earth
Yawns for me; and afar I see
My long-lost weep and sigh for me;
My woe has quenched their mirth.

Weep not! No earthly shame,
No earthly sin can weigh me down.
I come! Upon my brows that shining crown
Whose leaves are points of flame.

THE SECRET OF THE MANOR.

CHAPTER XI.—MR. BARBARY MAKES A DISCOVERY.

"What a thundering ass you are, Bill!"

This polite remark was made to William Staines, clerk to Mr. Barbary, solicitor, by James Underwood, ditto.

William looked up astonished, as most of us would at such an unprovoked attack. But his first instict was naturally for retaliation.

"You're another!" he said; and then, his sense of justice satisfied by the fairness of the retort, he quietly resumed his work.

"Well, but, Bill, don't you know what's up?"

"How should I?" answered Bill, resentfully. "You didn't tell me anything, except that I was a thundering ass."

"And that isn't news; but I can tell you some news, if you like."

"Out with it, then."

"You'll have Old Bobbery about your ears i you don't stir your stumps. There's a sight of work to be done. This deed will have to be finished by post time, and there's that will to be drawn, besides two leases, and a writ to make out for old Wilson presently when he calls. Young Larkyns has got into a scrape again, they tell me; and his father says he shall go to prison before he'll fork out, for he's done it twice too often already."

"Well, I couldn't be expected to guess all this if I wasn't told," said Bill, in a surly tone.

"I wasn't told about it officially, stoopid!"

This epithet, independently of its opprobriousness, was a great blow to William Staines, who had just begun to take pleasure in his own sagacity. He was about to improve upon it in his own retort when "Old Bobbery," as they irreverently termed their employer, entered the room.

"Now, then," said he, roughly, "do your work first, and quarrel afterwards."

"We can do our work and quarrel too," answered James Underwood, dauntlessly. "There's no reason why we shouldn't have our little pleasures as well as our elders."

"I tell you what, my lad, your tongue will get you into trouble some of these days, if you don't watch it!" and Mr. Barbary shook his head admonishingly towards the desk, and returned to his own room.

A wonderfully keen little man was John Barbary. Step by step he had worked his way up the ladder of fortune, and now that he had reached the top he could afford to smile at the steepness of the ascent. His lines had not fallen in pleasant places as a youth. His mother had been a shrew, and his father a drunkard. Often enough had the boy known what it was to go for a week together without bread, his sole meal in the day a mess of turnips and potatoes. But luck favored him, and favored him early. Passing along a by-street in Great Malston when he was about twelve years old, lovingly fingering two stray marbles he had happened to pick up, John Barbary came upon Mr. Jones, a solicitor of long practice in his native town. This gentleman was just stepping out of his office, and held a bundle of deeds in his hand, which he seemed to be sorting as he went along. The lad watched him, simply because he had nothing else to do, and presently he saw a light paper drop from the bunch and flutter to the ground. John stepped forward with alacrity, picked it up, and restored it to its owner.

"Dear me!" exclaimed Mr. Jones, examining it critically through his gold-rimmed spectacles, "where did you find this twenty pound note?"

"It dropped out of your papers, sir;" and John, who had never seen money in this form before, blamed the ignorance which had alone caused his honesty.

"Why didn't you keep it, lad, eh?" said the stern old lawyer, wheeling sharply about, and casting a searching glance into the boy's face.

"Keep it, sir!" answered John, assuming a tone of virtuous indignation; "it wasn't mine."

For John Barbary, who had no particular bias towards dishonesty, and was quite willing to be upright if uprightness could be made convenient and profitable, thought it advisable to act up to the character he had involuntarily assumed. With eyes modestly downcast he awaited the result of Mr. Jones's scrutiny.

"Come, little lad," said the old lawyer, kindly, his survey over, "I should be glad to do you a service in return for your honesty. What shall it be?"

"If I could be put in the way of doing some work, sir, I shouldn't want anything else," replied John Barbary, who saw how fatally and surely idleness and bare cupboards went hand in hand, and thought that work and full meals must be a better combination after all.

"Very well," said Mr. Jones, evidently pleased with the answer. "I know you—you are Barbary's son, of Jew street; but I'll give you a chance. I want an errand-boy. Come down to-morrow morning, at nine o'clock, on a week's trial, and if you suit me I'll keep you on, and possibly make something better of you in the end."

"Shall I get anything for it, sir?" asked John, unwilling to secure himself an increase of labor without proportionate advantages in other respects.

"Never you mind that—I'll see you don't starve."

And Mr. Jones nodded encouragingly and went his way.

This accident was the foundation of John Barbary's fortune. From errand-boy he became under-clerk, then head-clerk, after this a junior partner in the business; and, finally, when Mr. Jones retired, he had the field to himself, and sowed it with gold instead of grain. Now he was a highly-prosperous man, to whom people looked up with reference to his wealth, and not his size, for, as we have before asserted, Mr. Barbary was by no means a giant. He was now verging on fifty, but looked considerably younger. His hair was that of light sandy color which is very late in turning gray; and he had an active, nimble way about him which gave him quite a youthful appearance when he walked. His forehead was low and prominent, the brows overhanging the eyes, which were small and keen, of no defined color, and yet imparting a decided expression of astuteness to his physiognomy. The mouth was coarse, the lips those of a man who loved good living, and was more sensible than sensitive; but, nevertheless, it was a reticent mouth, one not given to indiscreet confidences. A certain benign glow of color on each of Mr. Barbary's high cheekbones gave you the idea that an empty cupboard was still his abomination, and that a glass of wine after dinner was not a luxury he had taught himself to despise. Perhaps if we said a bottle it might be nearer the mark, for we know that people who are partial to high-seasoned dishes suffer a good deal from thirst in consequence. Be this as it may, Mr. Barbary, having neither wife nor child, had no motive for stint, and had certainly earned his little indulgences by patient labor.

When Mr. Barbary had quitted the office and retired again into his own private room, the two clerks began to work with a diligence which would have been praiseworthy if it had only been persistent. But in ten minutes their pens had slackened speed, and their eyes were wandering.

"Bill," said the elder, thoughtfully, "what a thundering long will this seems! Why, if I'd fifty wives and two hundred children I could leave them all I'd got in less time than that."

"And so could I," answered Bill, who had £30 a year, and nothing found.

"Ours must be a rotten constitution," pursued James still more thoughtfully, "when you think that one can't tie up a house even for five years without a whole parchment full of palaver. But I tell you what," he added, after a pause, "ours is a fine profession, too. We're like parsons when they get into the pulpit—we can say what we like without anybody's contradicting us."

"I'd rather have a good tuck-out than a good talk, any day," answered Bill, who was lamentably deficient in sentiment. "I wish father had apprenticed me to a pastrycook. I should like to have had the polishing-off of all the stale tarts! Just you think of having all Saturday's leavings for Sunday's dinner! I'd take care everything wasn't sold out that day! I'd turn the tarts over so as to make people think there wasn't any jam inside, and then we shouldn't have more customers than we knew what to do with."

"And suppose you were——" began James Underwood, when the door opened in a sharp, imperious fashion, and Lord Gillingham entered the office.

It is mean and pitiful—it is even disgusting—to see how Englishmen worship rank. These two poor clerks, mongrel-bred up to the very roots of their hair, and humbly cognisant of the same, bowed and cringed before this lying, drunken peer as if he were a god instead of a lord. James Underwood, whose audacity held good under ordinary circumstances, was now breathless with awe; and Bill rose from his visionary feast like a slave who is caught regaling himself at his master's table.

"Is Mr. Barbary in?" said the earl, in his sharp, haughty manner.

"Yes, my lord," murmured James, growing pale with deference. "Shall I tell him that your lordship wants him?"

"No; I'll do that myself," answered Lord Gillingham; and without deigning to glance at his informer, he walked straight into Mr. Barbary's room.

Mr. Barbary was almost as much overcome with his presence as the two clerks. He had never before had the honor of a visit from his patron. Occasionally he had been sent for to Rendlesham Court, but at these times his interview had ostensibly been with the steward, and his lordship had merely strolled carelessly in towards the last, to be satisfied upon some point of law or question of favor. Mr. Barbary had never expected to see the day when Lord Gillingham should enter his private room unannounced, and he could not quite get over the novelty of the event. He handed his lordship the padded chair in which he was wont to luxuriate himself, and stood by the table, modestly awaiting information as to the reasons of the distinguished honor conferred upon him.

"Sit down, Barbary, sit down," said the earl, in a conciliatory tone, and Barbary obeyed, mutely grateful for the condescension. "I've something here I want you to examine for me," added his lordship presently, and he rummaged in the pocket of his greatcoat and brought out a folded paper, which he handed to the lawyer.

"Ah! a certificate of death," commented Barbary, getting more at his ease now that professional matters were introduced.

"Look at it carefully. Does it strike you as being a genuine document?" inquired the earl.

"Perfectly so, my lord. I should say it was a mere copy of the register."

"And there is nothing informal or suspicious about it?"

"Nothing whatever, my lord. Still, if your lordship should entertain any doubt upon the point, the best way would be to go to Woodruff, in Yorkshire, and consult the register."

"It seems hardly worth while," said the earl musingly. "I suppose it is all right."

"I have no doubt of it, my lord—but stop!" and Mr. Barbary gave another keen glance at the certificate in his hand, then put on his spectacles, and favored it with a critical and lengthy examination.

"Well?" said the earl, impatiently.

"I should say that the certificate itself was genuine, but that the date had been altered."

Lord Gillingham rose eagerly from his seat, and came and bent over the paper in his turn.

"Look, my lord—if you will pardon the liberty I take in begging you to put on my glasses—do you see that the date of Mrs. St. George's death is put down as the 11th? but my impression is that the figure given was originally a 1."

"And what makes you think that?"

"If your lordship will be obliging enough to take the trouble, you will perceive that not only was there insufficient space for two figures, but that they differ considerably in formation. The first, for instance, is made with a natural flourish, but the second was originally a mere straight line, and the flourish was an afterthought, added to make the imitation of the other more complete."

"What brings you to that conclusion?"

"I have other reasons, my lord, besides those I have just specified. The flourish in the second does not join the figure itself, and was evidently supplied several days later by the difference in the color of the ink, as well as by the way in which it is formed, being thicker at the top than at the bottom, as if by a downward stroke rather than by a natural movement of the pen, as would happen with a person who was in the habit of writing the figure 1 with a flourish."

"Very well."

"And you may distinctly perceive that the figures are crowded, the space being barely large enough for one. Besides that, it is plain to me that black ink was used in the first case, and what we call blue-black in the second."

"The clergyman might possibly have bungled the date," said the earl reflectively.

"He might, but it is hardly probable, as he would copy verbatim from the register before him. Besides, having no motive for concealment, he would, from the force of habit, write both figures in the same way."

"There is something in that."

"Then, too, my lord, it is highly improbable that he should have two bottles of different kinds of ink at his side."

"Still, in writing, some letters would be paler than others."

"But not of a different tinge, my lord."

"I see what you mean, but I can't understand what motive there could be for altering the date."

"Neither can I, my lord; therefore I simply confine myself to stating the fact without comment. If it was done, it must have been done with a motive, because people do not commit forgery for nothing, more especially a gentleman of Colonel St. George's position, who has so much at stake."

"Who told you that I suspected Colonel St. George?" said the earl sharply and haughtily.

"I presumed so, my lord," answered the lawyer, in a tone of humble deprecation. "I should be deeply grieved to cast any imputation upon a member of your lordship's distinguished family."

"Mind me here," replied the earl brutally, "I'll pay you off if you do. You may think that you're safely over the stile, and can do pretty well as you like, but I'll manage to show you you're mistaken if a single word of this business gets beyond your room."

"My lord, if I had not been gifted with professional discretion I should not have been trusted as I have been."

"Oh, I know you well, you lawyers; you'll hold your tongue if you can get anything by it, but if you can't, then you grow dangerous. Now, I'll just tell you what—Sir Barnard Symes is under my thumb; he'd as soon think of flying as of giving his daughter to any one I didn't approve. Do you understand?"

"My lord, I assure you these threats are quite unneeded; my honor and my interest would both keep me silent."

And Mr. Barbary blushed as he spoke, for Margaret Symes, with her broad shoulders and highly-colored cheeks, had seemed to him as much of an angel as any woman could be. Not only this, but to become the son-in-law of a baronet had always been Mr. Barbary's pet ambition, and the tempting cup seemed near his lips. Margaret was coy, but not indifferent. She had been setting her cap at people until the cap had worn out, and her patience too. All this trying and waiting had become dreary work, and the uncertainty of future success harassed her beyond measure. She was close upon thirty-four now, and although she had thought to look higher than John Barbary, she had gradually come to the conclusion that he merited encouragement, and consequently she had given him encouragement. Her father and mother, who, it may be supposed, had grown quite as tired of waiting as herself, looked on with something that was not, assuredly, disapproval. And so it came to pass that this was a sore subject with John Barbery, and that he would have given any possible guarantee of secrecy rather than that Lord Gillingham should put his threat into execution. He went on very humbly—

"Your lordship may trust me perfectly. I was brought up——"

"Yes, curse you!" interrupted his lordship, who had turned into one of his brutal tempers, "I know how you were brought up. Old Barbary wasn't a beggar, to do him justice, but that was only because he liked thieving better. I knew him well, and if ever there was a rogue on this earth, he was one."

"My lord—really——" stammered Barbary, junior, who hardly cared to have his family antecedents raked up so unceremoniously.

"Yes, really!" sneered the earl; "and another time don't you be so officious. Who the deuce wanted you to find out anything about Colonel St. George?"

"My lord—I thought——"

"Then you'd no business to think."

And his lordship went out, muttering some very ugly words; Mr. Barbary, like a beaten hound, following obsequiously at his heels.

The lawyer could not account for his patron's sudden perversity. It had seemed to him at first that the earl would be personally gratified by any discovery he could make affecting the character of Colonel St. George, and after he had exerted himself to afford his lordship that gratification, he had suddenly veered round to the opposite side, and censured him prodigally for his pains. It is never very agreeable to be forced to listen to abuse we dare not return. Retaliation is not only a pleasure, but an absolute relief. To Mr. Barbary, who had sharp wits, and a temper to match, to remain passive under reproach seemed more ignominious than moral. Had any stake less weighty than Margaret Symes hung upon the balance, the little lawyer would have charged his own cannon and made his office bad quarters for his savage adversary; but as it was, he carried on the war to some future day when, Margaret won, and a baronet his father-in-law, he should stand on more equal terms with his foe, and be able to return his fire without wounding his own hand.

CHAPTER XII.—ALL FOR LOVE.

Captain Marsh's steadfastness of purpose often went as far as obstinacy. This was the great fault of his character. It is true that he never made any decision without firmly believing it to be right; but after this it was impossible to make him understand that the fact was capable of a different interpretation or admitted of a modified rendering.

Cyril's father had not been the sort of man to make dependence on his counsels at all wise or judicious. General Marsh was good-hearted, but violent and irascible. He took as much pleasure as he could get out of life, then he lay down quietly to die, repeating almost word for word Lord Muskerry's saying when on his deathbed, "That he had nothing with which to reproach himself, never having denied himself anything."

This was Cyril's first grief, and one which he could not easily master, for it was without hope. He felt that there must be something more expected of us than self-indulgence; and that people did not wake with a conscience any the clearer for having gone to sleep on roseleaves. This lesson he carried dimly within him, hardly realising its issues or comprehending its full magnitude. Unfortunately for him, his mother was dead, and he was too reserved by nature to talk of his feelings to ordinary or indifferent people; consequently he struggled with them for a time, then shut them up in his own heart. As no new shock had come to quicken them again, they remained as dead, buried beneath a thick crust of worldliness and pride.

Still, he was a person to be trusted. Katie even had instinctively realised this, and, on his simple promise to take care of Nina, had shown herself content. Nina felt it too—felt it with a strange yearning desire to be something to him, and have personal profit out of his strength and self-reliance. She hardly knew that she loved him with a love which shapes a woman's destiny and moulds her at will. She had not dared yet to make any analysis of her sensations. She would not be satisfied that she could love now, and yet to feel the full significance of the change working in her, although she would not acknowledge its meaning. She walked as one in a dream. Her April bridal grave, she was grave; if he looked gay, she could forget all her troubles and be gay too. It was certain that some day soon now the scales would fall from her eyes, and she would confess that fib, and home, and kindred were of no less value to her than Cyrill's love; but, as she could gain no hope out of such avowal, it was better not made, even to herself. In destroying the doubt we often destroy our self-control.

Cyrill's keen eyes had read unerringly the gradual change in her feelings as regarded himself. At first she had hated him unconditionally; after that she had learnt to fear him, and yet value his approval; and, finally, her strong, passionate love had given itself unconsciously to him. Cyril was sorely tried, and one can hardly wonder that he fell. While Nina looked on him with indifference, he could find no excuse for indulging his own feelings, and was armed with one safeguard at least in the hour of temptation. But when he read his very soul by conjuring the light into Nina's eyes, and bringing a sudden bloom into the white cheek, Mrs. Trent's warning assumed the light of an unpardonable sin. In vain to persuade himself that no statements were worthy of credence without the support of facts. He had not stifled his conscience, and he had not yet grown flexible, and the sophistry of passion occasionally drowned its mandates.

Cyril loved Nina as men love the first woman who has touched their heart and turned its ice into fire. He had been cool in days gone by, and had often found himself wondering at the coldness of other men; but he was wiser now. All his confidence in himself was gone. He had declared that he was safe, and all the time he knew that his passion was as fierce and wild as in a maiden which is past cure. I might tell you how he wrestled with his love, how he beat it down one day to rise more vigorous than ever the next. I might, but cui bono? This old, old story needs no fresh telling, no effort at embellishment from new pens. Most have their experiences to gather from in writing at night, and those who have not are best unenlightened. It is a shame to destroy the ignorance which is also bliss.

Although Cyril had not come to a firm resolution of visiting Mrs. Oldum, and warning her that he would find some means of putting an end to her extortions, he had made up his mind honorably to inform Nina of his plan before he put it into execution. She was walking on the terrace one morning, enjoying the sunshine, when he joined her, meaning to tell her all; but the whole scheme, and then retreat before he should compromise himself by any indiscreet avowal. We shall see how he succeeded in his attempt to be generous.

Nina was pacing sharply up and down, and the exercise in the keen, frosty air had brought a rich bloom to her cheek and a brilliant light into her eyes. She heard directly and perceived Captain Marsh, and advanced smiling to meet him.

"I am glad you have come out," she said, gaily. "The morning is so delicious, I hardly care to enjoy it alone."

A fierce thrill passed to Cyrill's very feet. He felt giddy and faint. There had come to him suddenly one of those keen paroxysms of passion which overpower the reason and scatter to the winds all those fine theories of self-rule. That flush on the round cheek, that softened gleam in the marvellous eyes, the tremulous movement of the lips when the smile died away, were so many evidences of power which he could have spoken the principles of a stoic and made a king think meanly of his throne. Cyril forgot to wrestle, forgot to reason, and only remembered that he loved.

"Go away from me, child," he exclaimed, with almost savage earnestness. "Don't you see that I love you?"

She drew back a pace or two, and the flame died out of her eyes.

"Yes, I know," she replied, in a tone of deep dejection. "I know; you are ashamed."

"It is no question either of shame or unwillingness now, Nina; it is gone too far for that," said Cyril, gravely. "I cannot by put off with evasions any longer. Either you must explain to me what impediment stands between us or we must part for ever. I cannot be guilty of cheap and despair master me as if I were a child. I can't be sure of myself or my own resolution. The hour is come when I must know sooner rather than plead for an explanation of all these mysteries."

"Ah, now I see that you do not truly love me," said Nina, softly. "You don't know how much I would be. I did know, only I was mad, I suppose. Let me go, Cyril; what can am I here?"

But he was holding her fast.

"Never mind, I'll have you stop. Nay, don't struggle. I have your hand, and I mean to keep it until you can make it clear to me that I have no right to do so."

• Her temper was rising now, as it always did under opposition. She saw that Captain Marsh meant to torture her only for the easing of his mind, but for other reasons with which this had no connexion, and her pride was up in arms at once. She would yield nothing on compulsion. She had been close upon a frank and full confession —she was only putting off the evil hour as long as she could; but now he had forfeited the right to claim this, and she would keep her miserable secrets to herself. She must have lost him anyway; perhaps better, after all, that they should part in anger than in shame.

"You have no heart," she said, under her breath; "you oppress me because you know I am weak."

"You have been as gay as any of us lately; remember that."

"And why should I be always miserable? No one can meant either to grieve or to suffer eternally."

"You have crept back into your old evasions and subterfuges," said Cyril, sternly. "I had hoped that they were cast away for ever."

"And I had hoped that you would give up acting me pique and mortification."

"You wrong me there, Nina," replied Captain Marsh, sadly. "For days past, it seems to me, I have been nothing but your foe."

"And that is quite as unprofitable a post as either of the other two."

"Possibly; but all idea of profit gain sadly out of one's calculations at such times as these. I have lost a great part of my influence since I knew you."

"I am very sorry—"

"No, Nina, you are very glad, if you speak the truth. I know you so well; you love power beyond all things. Even such flawless infatuation as pleasing to you—an agreeable little triumph you would not willingly forego; and as for Lord Gillingham—"

"I suppose you are going to say that I like him?"

"No; but you like his homage."

"I have never had sufficient of it to enable me to judge."

"Then you soon will;" and Captain Marsh's manner unaccountably changed to that of great bitterness. "He means to do you the honor of asking you to become his wife."

"You are mad," said Nina; "he has given me no reason to anticipate such a proposal."

"Pardon me, he has spoken to Mr. Marsh."

"I think he might have consulted me beforehand," replied Nina, speaking quietly and coolly. "I do not recognise any one's right to decide for me in such a matter."

"Mr. Marsh has not decided for you."

"Then I think it would be as well if I made up my mind to accept Lord Gillingham," said Nina, passionately. "At anyrate I should be out of everybody's way then, and that would be a relief to them, if not to myself."

"Nina, my poor child, you must be mad," said Cyril, looking compassionately into her gloomy eyes. "Don't you know that, as men and women, all bonds are void unless they be called upon to give thos explanations to Lord Gillingham which you refuse to me? You understand best how palatable such a confession would be to him. Ah! if I were a woman I would rather scrub the floor and bake all the household bread than place myself in the power of a coxcomb such as Lord Gillingham. A woman's world is narrowed into the circumference of her own home. If she has no blessedness there, what compensation can there be in separation? and that is one which a woman feels almost as much as the complaint itself. I am not speaking of those who go out of this love-circle deliberately and prepared to batter with rude hands at even special provinces, getting ungracious victories at best, and thoroughly unseaming themselves in the contest. I am speaking of women—such women as we love all our lives, and pray for with our last breath. Such as these are pure diamonds, which, if dropped carelessly in a home made happy by and through them to the display of their full brilliancy. A man who wears a jewel of this kind may well defy the frowns of fortune and fate, for nothing can harm him much."

People of sensitive temperament, when under the influence of any strong excitement, either speak or act. A feeling of nervousness drives them necessarily into extremes. We have known persons who, whilst listening to a sad and painful tale, could restrain all outward expression of pain, and have often given offence on this account, when, to say one who understood them thoroughly, it would have been impossible for any sign of sympathy and distress as if they had actually cried. That this was a moment of supreme anxiety to Nina no one could doubt who took a glance into her white face. All the blessedness of love appeared to depend upon her present decision. At one time it seemed possible that she should be happy, and at other she wondered that she had ever dared to think of such a thing. Like Tantalus, she had brought her eager lips close to the pure stream which should banish her misery for ever, and was even then denied the satisfying draught. She must go away thirsting; she dared not drink of the water which seemed mingled with her tears, and was even then on all the more restless that they had been so near being assuaged. Nina's heart felt like bursting, and yet it was not in her power to relieve it of the load under her she turned upon Captain Marsh with a light, grating laugh.

"You are quite a domestic character, I see; I had no idea of that!"

Cyril looked deeply hurt and offended.

"Can you find nothing better to say to me?" he asked under his breath.

"What I might have found to say under happier circumstances it would be useless to repeat now, I think, and you would be sorry to hear."

This time she finished with a sob.

"You might make it possible. One little word—"

"Would only make it more than ever impossible."

"I could forgive a great deal, Nina."

"Yes, I know, Cyril, that you are good and generous; I acknowledged that even when I hated you. But there are some things a man of honor cannot overlook. You must see to injust to yourself for my sake."

"But why not let me judge, Nina?"

"Because in your present state of feeling you might be easily tempted to any self-sacrifice."

"And, Nina, you could not refuse?"

"No; that's it. I could not."

"Then tell me, Nina, my beloved!"

"Never, Cyril, never; I should die of shame! I thought I could do it a little time back, but now it seems more impossible than it ever seemed before. If I were to confess everything, and you were to marry me in spite of my past, we could only be happy just at first. When your love grew cool you would reproach me for bygone sins, and regret your marriage, looking upon me as a designing temptress who had taken advantage of your infatuation to draw you into an unjustifiable connection."

"You called me generous a minute ago; should I merit that character if I could be capable of reproaching you for a past which I had made up my mind to forgive, and forget even for my wife?"

"I do believe, Cyril, that you, alone of all the men I know, might be trusted in such a situation; but I could not trust myself. If you looked grave, I should fancy that you were trying to hide your regrets; and if anything should ever cause you to be harsh to me, I should suffer a thousand times more than I could possibly do now. Our very lamps are harsh to them. So you see, Cyril, it is best that we should remain as we are."

"I cannot think so, Nina. I will wait."

"Time brings no remedy in this case, Cyril. The world will not let a woman obliterate the past by any means. Even if I could, a coarse enemy may dash it in her face, and with one word undo the efforts of years. It is very hard, it is very cruel, that we should never be allowed to outlive our sins, as we do, and make ourselves a new name and reputation; but so it is, and lamentations and complaints are mere waste of time. You see, Cyril, that I have not a thing to remedy in this case; being a woman, I am forbidden either to forget or retrieve my errors."

"You are a child to reason so," said Nina; "she has given me no reason to anticipate such a proposal."

"Pardon me, he has spoken to Mr. Marsh."

"I think he might have consulted me beforehand," replied Nina, speaking quietly and coolly. "I do not recognise any one's right to decide for me in such a matter."

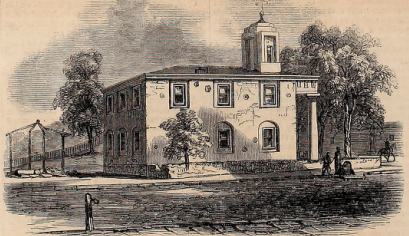
VIEW OF THE STOCKADES AND FORTIFICATIONS AROUND THE CAPITOL, NASHVILLE, TENN.—FROM A SKETCH BY FRED. B. SCHELL.



THE CAPITOL, NASHVILLE.

Our Special Artist at Nashville some time since, when the rebels were menacing that important city in hopes of diverting Sherman from Atlanta, was struck with the scene at the State Capitol. The building itself, of immense proportions and of magnificent design, was entirely surrounded by earthworks and stockades of great strength; all the staircases and other approaches being thus defended. The strange association of the beautiful in art with the grim weapons of war is as sad as it is picturesque. The view of the country beyond, with tents scat ered far off in the distance, and the city around formed a scene seldom equalled and not easily forgotten.

THE COURTHOUSE, CHARLESTOWN, VA.

This building has a history never to be forgotten. It was the scene of the closing events of the life of John Brown, of Harper's Ferry notoriety. Since the beginning of the present unhappy strife between North and South, the tide of war has rolled backwards and forwards several times, the place having been alternately held by both parties.

The building stands still, showing its marks of war, the holes pierced for musketry, with marks of shot and shell, and the waste and havoc occasioned by the army waves that have surged to and fro in the once happy valley of the Shenandoah, "the valley" of which Virginians spoke as though earth owned no other.

GRANT ON THE WELDON RAILROAD.

All quiet in Grant's army! When this report comes day after day, our readers must not suppose that our army is idle, that Grant is doing nothing. There is more to be done in war than meeting and repulsing attacks or assaulting works, as our readers will understand by the valuable sketches in our present paper.

The solid and formidable fort thrown up by the 5th corps shown in the smaller sketch, and the line of that corps and the 9th as shown from that fort in the larger one, with the abatis in front, and covering the very line of the road, look like possession. The rebel lines cannot be seen in these sketches, being shut out from view by the curtain of woods which the reader will observe.

The rebel papers affect to make light of the loss of this road, but they feel it immensely. After a point is lost, they always discover that it possesses no strategic importance. The loss of Fort Morgan is nothing. Mobile is safe without it, and Gaines and Powell being gone made Fort Morgan of no value. Why defend it then? So, too, Atlanta has now turned out to be of no importance whatever. They can retake it at pleasure. So here the Weldon road is unimportant, but they fight two or three bloody battles to show how little they care for it. How an attack on our lines there now will fare, the reader can judge, and yet we are told that Lee is massing his men for a last desperate effort to force the hand from his throat.

THE SIEGE OF MOBILE—EXPLOSION OF FORT POWELL AT GRANT'S PASS, JULY 5.—FROM A SKETCH BY E. B. HOUGH.

FORT POWELL, MOBILE HARBOR.

AFTER the entrance of Farragut's fleet into Mobile bay, and the dispersion, capture and ruin of the rebel fleet, Fort Powell, at Grant's pass, the bombardment of which some months since our readers will remember from our sketches at the time, became totally useless to the rebels. They had not consulted Farragut as to his plans, and as he ungenerously withheld information they were unfortunately not in a posture to give him a suitable welcome on his approach from the bay. After the fight the Union fleet bore away towards the fort, really to be out of range of Fort Morgan; but the commander of Fort Powell seeing only an attack on himself, blew up the fort in the evening. We give from actual view a sketch of the explosion, and of the fort as it appeared when we entered it.

WASHINGTON'S CAVE.

AMID the hurrying march and countermarch through the Shenandoah valley, our Artist paused in view of Ashby's Gap in the Blue Ridge, to sketch a cave two miles south of Charlestown, in Clarke county, in the interesting Selden estate. This cave has a local reputation, from the fact that Washington is said to have here held the first Masonic meeting west of the Blue Ridge. We have applied to several of the craft who might be supposed to know of Masonry in Virginia, but have failed to ascertain the time when this occurred, or the lodge whose meeting was held in this romantic spot.

THE "BOMB-PROOFS" AT ATLANTA!

SUCH of our readers as perused the charming volume "Cave Life in Vicksburg," issued by Appleton, need little explanation of the bomb-proofs of Atlanta, of which we give an interior view. To those less familiar we may say that they are excavations in the soil roofed with heavy logs, over which is heaped the loose earth to the height of a young Ararat. These little mounds may be seen all over the city. The garden to almost every house which does not boast a cellar is now supplied with its artificial "bomb-proof." They are perfectly secure against the metal storm, and many of them are quite comfortably furnished with beds and chairs and other furniture. Women and children were huddled together in them for hours at a time, and when the city was furiously shelled at night the whole community may be said to have been underground. Hither in days of steady bombardment the less prudent fled, for cellars, the common resort, were only traps. Some times for days they lived there, eating, sleeping, working, plying as of old the spinning-wheel and other ancient implements.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE JAMES RIVER.

WHEN Gen. Grant resolved to cross the James and operate on Richmond from both sides of the river, it became necessary to guard against a sudden descent by the rebel rams, which, built on that Merrimac pattern so steadfastly adhered to by the South, lay at Richmond ready to annihilate all Northerndom.

THE SIEGE OF MOBILE—RUINS OF FORT POWELL AFTER THE EXPLOSION.—FROM A SKETCH BY E. B. HOUGH.

A line of piles was accordingly driven down, and our Monitors lying below it to keep watch and ward, ready to treat Merrimacs as we have done at Hampton, Charleston, New Orleans and Mobile.

Our Special Artist gives a view of this position taken from the Crow Nest battery, a high position from which a hundred pounder thunders on the enemy. The enemy feel this point to be vitally important, and have made the high banks bristle with cannons covering our batteries and operations.

MY GRANDMOTHER'S STORY.

I WILL try to tell it as nearly as possible just as the old lady told it to me. It was her one story, the great event of her life, and he assured she told it more than once. This was the way it went:

It was a great many years ago, my dear, long before you were born, that my husband met with a serious accident in New York, fracturing his leg by a fall into a ship's hold. I was sent for immediately, or rather the news was sent to me, and I determined to go directly to the city. We lived then in New York State, about two hundred miles distant from my point of destination, and there was no means of whirling one from point to point with greater rapidity than they could stay at home. Railroads were unthought of, and stage coaches only ran over the most frequented routes. After a family council, rather confined in suggestions—for I had but few to advise me—it was concluded that I should set out on horseback, with Martin Frobish, our hired man, who was what was called "a German redemptioner" in those days, which means that he was an emigrant from that country, whose services for a certain term had been sold to my husband to pay his passage to this country, and that Martin, who had been with us for several years, was to be my squire to such a point as was best for taking the stage coach for New York.

That matter settled, we set out. The first night of our travel we stopped at the house of an acquaintance of my husband's, but it is with the second night's travel that the whole of my story lies.

It was almost an hour after dark when we drew up by the gate of a wayside inn, that displayed a dingy sign of a horse with a man standing by it, and an announcement of "entertainment for man and horse," as its warrant. There was something in the look of the place as I entered that struck a chill through me, but there was no help for it, there I had to stay.

The premises consisted of one large and general room, the bedrooms being all above stairs, the uninviting entrance to which was from the general room. I endeavored as far as possible to make myself contented with my situation, and to accept the sulky attentions of my host and his wife with a pleasant manner, but still there was a constraint that was far from being pleasant. I watched Martin get his supper, and saw him, after dozing for an hour by the fire, go off to his bed. He had scarcely gone when a knock came to the door, and it was opened. The man admitted was undoubtedly an American, apparently an Eastern man. He was tall and raw-boned, but there was a homely air of honesty and good-nature in his face that came like a ray of sunshine into the great cheerless room at once, and made me feel as though I was safe in his presence. He wanted supper and a bed. The matter was discussed between him and the host, and the result was that my honest-faced friend arranged to occupy the landlord's room, who was to take his chances in the large room we sat in for the night.

I cannot explain how or why, but I felt from the moment he entered the house as if my safety was secured. As far as I could understand, the room in which he was to sleep was next to my own. This was something I especially appreciated when I became aware, which I did very soon after he went away, that Martin had gone to the barn to sleep, and was consequently far beyond the reach of my voice should I have wanted to call him. With this feeling strong upon me, I watched the newcomer's every move, and when the time came for him to retire to his room I was very sorry to see him go. Go he did, however, and in good time I followed. I expected when I reached my room, which was a cheerless, ill-furnished one, that I would hear my next door neighbor stirring, but I was disappointed, and after listening awhile concluded that he had made rapid preparations, and had got into his bed. This, of course, was my own best plan, and I looked around to see the proper thing to be done. There was a fire upon the hearth, not a bright one, and I had a candle, so that what light could do for the room was done. I first looked to the door, and very much to my annoyance I found that the lock had been removed, and there was no fastening. Then came a time of consideration, and the result of it was that I attempted to secure the door by other means. I tried to make a chair act as a prop against the broken lock, unsuccessfully, and then I lugged, with great labor, the heavier articles of furniture across the room, until I had them piled against the door, though even then in a way that I felt would be insufficient should a resolute man undertake to force an entry. I had done my best with that when I went over to the fire, and sat down before it, upon the floor, with the idea of there pulling off my shoes and stockings. I had scarce touched the floor, when, by a turn of my head, I threw one glance under the bed. It was but an instant, but that instant froze all the blood in my veins. There was a man there, and that man was the traveller who had so prepossessed me. The turn of my head was very rapid, but it was long enough for me to be sure that I was not mistaken. Within the space of a few seconds all that I had ever read or heard of cases of sudden danger flashed across my mind, and I thought of what I should do. I could not go to work to remove the barricade I had built against the door, for that would bring him instantly upon me. I could not make believe that I had forgotten anything below, for that would be too transparent, and what was more I now felt confident, notwithstanding their great tact in concealing it, that this man was in league with the people of the house. I saw no chance for my life, but the window, a sudden jump from it, and a flight into the weeds; but this idea was dissipated in a moment by an attempt on my part to raise the sash, as though to shut in the outer shutter; and finding it was nailed down, there was nothing for it now, but either to meet death at his hands, quietly, without a struggle, or to battle for it as far as woman's strength will suffice against that of a man's.

I went back to my seat by the fire, and without looking, for I really believe that the horror of my situation gave me eyes in the back of my head, I saw this man under the bed, and saw his great, fierce gray eyes glaring out from the darkness upon me, and watching with a fiery eagerness. What, in heaven's name, should I do? I did not dare to scream, as I felt sure that it would only hasten my doom, nor yet could I escape. I felt pretty sure that unless I forced him to it by making an alarm, the man would attempt nothing until I was fairly asleep. From my point of observation, without appearing to do so, I took a view of the whole matter. I saw that the man had got to the situation he was in by creeping under at the foot of the bed, but that it was very unlikely he would get out that way, but that he would rather rise upon the side nearest to the wall, between which and the bed there was a place about eighteen inches in width, and to this point I turned my attention.

I undressed myself as deliberately as though I had been in my own room in safety at home, and went through all the routine. It required wonderful nerve, my dear, but you must understand that my life was in the scale, and I was determined to go through with it. Just before I got into bed I went to my travelling bag and took from there my scissors, for I wanted them to carry out what I had made up my mind to do.

I got into bed, every drop of my blood creeping like ice through my veins, but still determined to play my part. I did not want the man over whose carcase I sat—for that was my position on the bed—to think I had fallen into slumber too easily, and for that reason, before and after I got into bed, I hummed quite loudly to myself the air of a song. But while I was doing so, with my scissors I cut the upper sheet of the bed into strips about fifteen inches in width, and, with fierce rapidity, twisted them together until I had a rough, strong cord. This was to be my weapon of defence, and as soon as I had it finished I blew out my candle and prepared for sleep.

Don't think from this that I lay down and became composed.

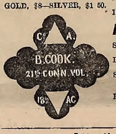
As soon as the candle was blown out the glimmering light of the fire was all I had to go by, and this barely allowed me to see what I wanted to do. I knelt upon the bed, facing the wall, perfectly silent and grasping my cord in both hands. The room was still, and I could hear my own heavy breathing, as, without doubt, the man beneath me could. I think almost an hour must have passed away, I sitting, or rather kneeling with my face to the wall, before I heard a motion under the bed, and when I did it almost deprived me of sense. I watched that space between the bed and wall as I never watched any point or spot before, and thought of my fate should he fail to emerge in the very place I had calculated on. At last, after an hour, which to me seemed ten, I heard a movement, and in a minute saw the top of a head protruding from its hiding place. I stretched forth my arms, and quick as lightning, before the eyes were above the level of the bed, threw the cord I held behind the head, loosely. Another instant and the eyes came up and stared in astonishment, almost in terror, at the figure kneeling in the bed facing them. I did not wait a moment for him to recover from the first shock, but with the strength that seemed that of a giant I jerked the cord tight, and drew the neck of the man against the wooden crosspiece of the bedstead, where, with a force and strength I had never before exerted in my life, I held it by throwing back my entire weight. Had my purpose or the cord given away at that moment, in ten minutes I would have been dead.

I strained tighter and tighter on the twisted cloth in desperate agony. I heard the great limbs beneath the bed struggle and flounder about in terrible desperation. I saw the long, lank arms occasionally rise above the bed in fierce attempts to clutch at me, but every fresh grasp only drew the cord tighter by throwing me farther back. I saw the horrible eyes starting out from the head, and growing dimmer and dimmer every moment, and the tobacco-stained lips growing paler, but still I clung with fearful energy and weight to the cord.

How long this horrible state lasted I have no means of telling. I feel sure that I was perfectly conscious until all life had left the man, and then I must have sunk into gradual insensibility, for long after the time usual for breakfast, when no stir was heard about, the landlady came to my door, and failing to get any response, brought up Martin Frohish, and between the two the door was forced, and I was found rigid on the bed, kneeling, with the weight of my body thrown back upon the tightly-grasped cord, and the head of the dead man just protruding above the bed.

It was a day or two before I was able to understand or converse on the terrors of that night, and a week before I was able to leave that wayside inn; but before I went away I freely confessed to the false opinion I had formed of my host and hostess, who during that week surpassed my every wish in their attention and kindness, and whom, I very soon knew, hid, under a rough manner, the kindest of hearts, and knew as little of the man I had been the instrument to punish as I did myself.

An inquiry brought out the fact that he was a desperado, who had carried terror through a neighboring county, having committed several murders, and having concluded to change his locality and try his hand in another direction, met his punishment on the first attempt.



CHEAP BREAD.

"BREAD and butter" are the only articles of food of which we never tire for a day, from early childhood to extreme old age. A pound of fine flour or Indian (corn meal) contains three times as much meat as one pound of butcher's roast beef; and if the whole product of the grain, bran and all, were made into bread, 15 per cent. more nutriment would be added. Unfortunately the bran, the coarsest part, is thrown away, the very part which gives soundness to the teeth, and strength to the bones, and vigor to the brain. 500 pounds of fine flour give to the body 30 pounds of the bony element, while the same quantity of bran gives 125 pounds! This bone is "lime," the phosphate lime, the indispensable element of health to the whole human body, from the want of the natural supply of which multitudes of persons go into a general "decline." But swallowing "phosphates" in the shape of powders or in syrups to cure these "declines" has little or no virtue. The articles contained in these "phosphates" must pass through nature's laboratory, must be subject to her manipulations, in alembiacs specially prepared by Almighty power and skill, in order to impart their peculiar virtues to the human frame. In plainer phrase, the shortest, safest and most infallible method of giving strength to the body, bone and brain, thereby arresting disease and building up the constitution, is to eat and digest more bread made out of the whole grain, whether of wheat, corn, rye or oats.

But we must get an appetite for eating more, and a power of digesting more. Not by the artificial and lazy method of drinking bitters and taking tonics, but by moderate, continued and remunerative muscular exercise in the open air every day, rain or shine. And that we may eat the more of it the bread must be good, and cheap, and healthful; and that which combines these three qualities to a greater extent than any other known on the face of the globe, as far as we know, is made thus: To two quarts of corn (Indian) meal, add one pint of bread-sponge; water sufficiently to wet the whole; add one half pint of flour and a teaspoonful of salt. Let it rise, then knead well, unsparingly, for the second time. Place the dough in the oven and let it bake an hour and a half. Keep on trying until you succeed in making a light, well-baked loaf. Our cook succeeded admirably by our directions at the very first trial. It costs just half as much as bread from the finest family flour, is lighter on the stomach, and imparts more health, vigor and strength to the body, brain and bone. Three pounds of such bread (at five cents a pound for the meal) affords as much nutriment as nine pounds of good roast beef (costing, at twenty-five cents, $2 25), according to standard physiological tables.

A PONDEROUS gold guard chain has just been completed at a chain and jewellery manufactory in Springfield, for a man in New York, who has a fancy for "big things." It is four feet long, weighs a pound and a quarter, big enough to chain an ox with, and cost $900. Rather loud, that.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

The Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that subscriptions will be received for Coupon Treasury Notes, payable three years from August 15th, 1864, with semi-annual interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum—principal and interest both to be paid in lawful money.

These notes will be convertible, at the option of the holder at maturity, into six per cent. gold bearing bonds, payable not less than five nor more than twenty years from their date, as the Government may elect. They will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1,000 and $5,000, and all subscriptions must be for fifty dollars, or some multiple of fifty dollars.

As the notes draw interest from August 15, persons making deposits subsequent to that date must pay the interest accrued from date of note to date of deposit.

Parties depositing twenty-five thousand dollars and upwards for these notes at any one time will be allowed a commission of one-quarter of one per cent.

Special Advantages of this Loan.

IT IS A NATIONAL SAVINGS BANK, offering a higher rate of interest than any other, and the best recurrently. Any savings bank which pays its depositors in U. S. Notes considers that it is paying in the best circulating medium of the country, and it cannot pay in anything better, for its own assets are either in Government securities or in notes or bonds payable in Government paper.

Convertible into a Six per Cent. 5-20 Gold Bond.

In addition to the very liberal interest on the notes for three years, this privilege of conversion is now worth about three per cent. per annum, for the current rate for 5-20 Bonds is not less than nine per cent. premium, and before the war the premium on six per cent. U. S. stocks was over twenty per cent. It will be seen that the actual profit on this loan, at the present market rate, is not less than ten per cent. per annum.

Its Exemption from State or Municipal Taxation.

But aside from all the advantages we have enumerated, a special Act of Congress exempts all bonds and Treasury notes from local taxation. On the average, this exemption is worth about two per cent. per annum, according to the rate of taxation in various parts of the country.

It is believed that no securities offer so great inducements to lenders as those issued by the Government. In all other forms of indebtedness, the faith or ability of private parties, or stock companies, or separate communities, only is pledged for payment, while the whole property of the country is held to secure the discharge of all the obligations of the United States.

Subscriptions will be received by the Treasurer of the United States, at Washington, the several Assistant Treasurers and designated Depositaries, and by all National Banks which are depositaries of public money, and throughout the country will give further information and

The subscriber has, for more than 20 years past, been in the habit of procuring literary manuscripts for the Press. At first the labor was one of kindness, and performed gratuitously; but it became so burdensome, and absorbed so much time, that a small charge for the value of his services for became necessary. This fee, not exceeding $25, and generally less, compensated him for a careful and critical perusal of a work in manuscript, and the offering of it, if approved, to publishers.

The subscriber continues to receive and read manuscripts in the same manner, giving his candid opinion concerning them, and arranging for their printing and publication, when desired to do so. He makes his charges as small as possible, since his chief object is to aid and encourage authors.

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 470—Vol. XIX.] NEW YORK, OCTOBER 1, 1864. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly, 10 Weeks $1 00.

Our Financial Affairs—Prices—The Prospect Before Us.

Gold has been for some time, and still is steadily tending downwards. From its highest advance of 285 a fall of some 60 odd per cent. is an immense gain to the Treasury, the faith of the nation, and the country, and people at large. The bulls of Wall street, during the past two weeks, have left no stone unturned to keep up the price of gold; but with all their ready resources and cunning devices, they have failed and have lost heavily. Irresistible causes are at work against which no gambling contrivances, however powerful or ingenious, can succeed. Public confidence in the complete success of the war for the Union has been universally restored with the fall of Atlanta, and with the present satisfactory condition of things in reference to the beleaguered city of Richmond. This confidence, which extends to the crowning success of the war during the present Virginia campaign of Gen. Grant, is the very simple solution of this downward tendency in gold, as compared with the national paper currency.

We believe, too, that the fall of Richmond is near at hand; and we have no doubt that with the evacuation or surrender of his capital by Jeff. Davis, the remaining remnants of his "Confederacy" will be substantially dissolved. What then? How will our financial and business affairs be affected by the dissolution of his "Confederacy," and the submission of the rebellious States to the Union? There will be a financial reaction. Gold will go down with a run to its real value, as compared with the national paper currency; and the prices of all things, labor, and the products of agriculturists and manufacturers, the wares of merchants and traders of all descriptions, will as rapidly decline, making due allowances for the tariff and internal revenue taxes.

This idea has apparently taken a firm hold upon the public mind; for to the extent of our observation, notwithstanding certain onward shows of general extravagance, industrious men and women of all classes are beginning to practise the virtues of a sagacious economy. They are wisely calculating what may be advantageously saved in provisions, fuel, clothing, etc.; and in the consumption of luxuries there is, we are sure, in the aggregate, a reduction which would show that the rule of retrenchment is gaining a foothold throughout the community. Economy is manly beginning to be considered a creditable novelty as a private duty, and especially when justified by the plea that extravagant outlays now are foolish, in view of the better times that are surely coming. We like this idea, for in proportion as the expenditures of a community in provisions, coal, drygoods, etc., are reduced, the costs of all these articles are at once affected to the advantage of the consumer.

Retrenchment, therefore, for the present, is not only a wise proceeding in anticipation of the better times of approaching peace, but in view of the immediate reduction of all the costs of living. With the suppression of the rebellion, there are some two or three millions of bales of cotton in the South that will be brought into market, the cash value of which in the matter of our foreign exchanges, will be, the gain to us of so much gold. Next, the rebellious States will widen the area of our national currency, and the markets of our Northern farmers and mechanics, and the demands for labor equal to the disbandment of our armies in the field. We may, therefore, confidently expect, that there will be a running commercial reaction with the end of the war to any great class of the American people, not excepting the unfortunate people of the South, whose financial means and hopes are involved in the paper of the Davis Confederacy. By submission to the Union they will lose nothing that can be saved under Davis, for, as repudiation has already extinguished one-third of the paper issues and obligations of Davis, the other two-thirds would soon be liquidated in the same way, even if his scheme of Southern independence were successful. Therefore, the sooner the people of the South are relieved of that delusive despotism and restored to the Union, the sooner they will be placed in the only condition in which they can repair their broken fortunes. Their markets will be once supplied, and in filling them the Government and the loyal States, and all the people concerned in every way, will be immensely strengthened from the substantial exchanges of the South. In a word, as we can now safely do, if we embrace the South in our financial estimates of the future, we may say that in regard to prices and the National currency we have everything to hope and very little to fear whatever for distrust. We have weathered the roughest of the storm, and the danger of shipwreck is past.

FOREIGN NEWS

THE London Times blames the policy of the pirate rebel ships, saying their wanton burnings of commercial marine will do much to reunite the North, and make enemies of numbers of people who have no sympathy with Yancein and his party.

The New York correspondent of the London Times continues his letter from Niagara Falls as the Democratic wrangling at that place in regard to the Chicago Convention. He maintains that if the election to fair unbiased by Chicago nominee and platform or precedent, on the platform of an armistice and convention of States. He thinks that the armistice will suit all men and parties, except contractors.

The half-pound sneering for the sinking fund of the Confederate loan took place on the 1st. Nearly one-sixth part of the whole loan has been redeemed, viz., $340,000 sterling by cotton, and $138,000 by the sinking fund.

The Times, of the 3d, has another editorial on the peace proposals of America, in which it says: "It is hardly be doubted that this very important period in the politics of the Union has arrived. Should the tendency has been peaceful for a long time, recent events have increased its movement and made it, it would seem, almost general."

A trial of the Ericsson, one of the rebel arms bought by the British Government, has been made; she is managed nearly 13 knots an hour, and answered her helm readily.

EDUCATION IN TURKEY.—The Turkish Government is at present making great efforts for the improvement of education in Turkey. In the public schools a number of elementary school-books, which are gradually coming into use. The attempt it has made to improve the ordinary teachers have not yet been very successful; but in those schools in which a higher kind of instruction is given, and which are equivalent to our grammar-schools, the efforts of the Government have been productive of much good. There are 12 of these schools in Constantinople, and one in each of the other towns and cities. The scholars in all of them together amount to about 4,500, of whom nearly one-half belong to those in Constantinople. They are highly esteemed, especially by the pupils, and constant applications are made for the establishment of new ones.

VIRGINIA—SHERIDAN'S CAMPAIGN.

Gen. Sheridan officially reports a victory in the Shenandoah valley. Gen. Getty, of his command, fell in with a rebel force encamped, on the 13th morning, Sept. 13th, the position of Early's forces, four divisions of which occupied the west bank of the Opequan. Gens. Wilson and Merritt, with their cavalry, dashed along the Winchester pike on the same morning, charged through a fifth division of the rebels, and captured an entire battery of South Carolinians with their officer and brigade commander. This feat was accomplished with the loss of but two men killed and three wounded. Another charge was made on the right of the line, during which an officer and 11 men were captured. Sheridan is now gathering in the fruits of victory.

GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

Gen. Lee has now to defend Richmond about 75,000 men, but his ranks are filled up with old men of 60 and boys of 15, and the mountains are full of deserters who cannot be found. The loss by desertion is constant and rapid, and the officers give strict orders to fire on any one seen leaving the lines. The relative state of Lee's army is represented in the Confederate army now by a regiment of about 100 men, and this is rapidly decreasing.

The usual amount of picket firing along the lines of the contending forces around Petersburg still continues night and day, but Grant is fully determined not to allow a similar surprise to take place as that by which we captured the line of works last week.

A On Wednesday, Sept. 14, Gen. Birney opened his batteries on the city and rebel works in his front, and kept up a furious cannonade for one two hours. On the same afternoon the enemy opened a terrific artillery fire on three signal towers on the flanks of the Bisk corps, but inflicted no injury that was not easily repaired. The death of Brig.-Gen. Howell, of Pennsylvania, commanding a brigade in the 10th corps, is announced. He was killed by his horse falling upon him.

On the 16th a large body of rebel cavalry swept down of 5,000 head of cattle, the reserve herd at Harrison's Landing.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The French beat Fawn, while on the passage from to Roanoke island, through the canal, ... ared and burned by the rebels on the 8th inst. Major Jenny, Provost Judge at Newberne, together with the crew of the FAWN were also captured.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

We have news from Hilton Head to the 13th inst. No active military operations of importance are reported. The 600 rebel officers recently consigned to Gen. Foster have been placed in the stockade on the north end of Morris island, under the fire of the rebel batteries, and the commander at Charleston notified of the fact. As a result of this, these prisoners are to fare precisely as do the Union officers placed under fire in Charleston. Gen. Saxton has organised a saving band for the contrabands, and has also issued an order prohibiting the purchase of cotton from the negroes in advance of the harvest.

GEORGIA.

Having resolved to make Atlanta a strictly military post, Gen. Sherman has ordered all the white inhabitants to leave Atlanta and to proceed either North or South as they may elect. A ten days' truce had been agreed upon between Hood and Sherman, in order that transportation should be provided for these who chose to go South.

MISSOURI.

The rebels have organised another invasion of Missouri. Despatches from the Southwest state that Gen. Price, with 5,000 cavalry, crossed the Arkansas river at Little Rock and Fort Smith on the 8th inst., en route for Missouri; and it is conjectured that his destination is Springfield, while Shelby's rebel force will attack Cape Girardeau. These posts are said to be strongly garrisoned and able to repel any demonstration that may be made against them.

NAVAL.

The following blockade runners have recently been caught. British steamer Elsie, captured on the 5th, by the Quaker City and Keystone State, with 220 bales of cotton. Steamer A. D. Vance, captured on the 11th, by the Santiago de Cuba, with 400 bales.

An investigation has been held at the Gosport Navy Yard to inquire into the cause of the burning of the steamship Brandywine on the 3d inst., and the result of the inquiry has been sent to the Secretary of the Navy at Washington thereupon.

The United States steamer J. P. Jackson, of the Gulf squadron, captured about the beginning of the present month the rebel schooner Lizzie, armed with one gun, in Mississippi sound, where she had been cruising with the intention of attacking and capturing our vessels.

A correspondent in the Express clears up the mystery which has hung over the fate of the Electric Spark, recently captured by the Florida off the coast of Brazil. The Spark was taken after her capture by the Florida, she, with the Florida, proceeded to one of the small keys, not over 85 miles from Nassau, where her cargo—which was a very valuable one, and especially adapted for the rebels, there being a large quantity of winter clothing and shoes—was put on board a vessel rechipped on a blockade runner, and has long ere this been safely landed in Dixie. The vessel was then to be put in order to carry guns, and to be altered as much as possible to resemble as that ere long, most likely, she will be prowling along the coast.

A Copy of Frank Leslie—A War Relic.

LIEUT.-COL. A. W. BISHOP, 1st Arkansas cavalry, has politely sent us a copy of our paper of Jan. 16, 1858, with this explanatory note:

HEADQUARTERS 1ST ARK. CAV. VOL.
Fayetteville, Ark., Sept. 4, 1864.

DEAR SIR—I enclose a copy of your paper of date Jan. 16, 1858, taken from the body of a bushwhacker, killed this morning in a skirmish, or rather a bushwhacking scrape. Headquarters 1st Brigade, Col. D. Jet Anderson's cavalry, on the west fork of White river, six miles from Cane Hill, Washington county, Arkansas. It is a curiosity, at least, Carl Formes has felt the effects of this rebel bullet, and I hope it may be harmless to him as the one by which his reputation was destroyed. Please accept the enclosed sheet. It may not be unworthy of preservation.

Very respectfully yours,
A. W. BISHOP,
Lieut.-Col. 1st Ark. Cav.

FRANK LESLIE, Esq.

On the first page was a portrait of Carl Formes, through which a rebel bullet had drilled the bushwhacker. The paper had never been cut open, and was doubtless taken from a file on some house where they had been plundering.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE ART JOURNAL. September, 1864. London: James Virtue, New York: Virtue, Yorston & Co.

This elegant monthly makes its welcome appearance in all regularity, and continues to sustain the reputation it has long enjoyed for excellence. The present number is a fine one. The steel illustrations are O'Neill's "Foundling," engraved by Lightfoot; Turner's "Heidelberg," by Prior; "A Spanish Girl," by Murillo, engraved by Blanchard—all three exceedingly fine. The article on "Modern Art" is the most interesting of the literary portion of the week. We have, however, only room for the following extract:

"The art journal of Westwood and Strutts, so full of interest, is nearly concluded, and given, with illustrations, a most vivid portrait of the great potter. Specimens of "Dibdin's Illustrated Arabian Nights," a continuation of "Wright's History of Caricature and the Grotesque in Art," an interesting on "Forged Antiquities," with the usual summary of art news, fill up the charming pages.

TOWN COSSIP.

THERE is something wonderful in the idea of a country involved in the very depths of a terrible civil war, and yet existing in the highest state of prosperity. This is simply the case with these Northern United States. In spite of all the drain upon our population, the consequent scarcity of labor, the depreciation of the currency, and the expenditure of wealth, we never were more prosperous or rich on the whole than we are this day. The immense wealth of a lifetime has come forth from the closets and chests of sturdy farmers, to be used in clothing for the men who are going to fight our battles in the field, and the whole land teems with money. Crops are overflowing, mechanics are busy, factories are groaning beneath, and no pair of hands need be uncoupled with paying employment unless they choose to. Never before was so much money, goods imported into them, or land reclaimed; never did all articles of luxury stand a better chance of being consumed, and yet the people open their purses pockets for the acquisition of whatever is for sale. New York is once more in town, after astonishing all the country with its overflowing treasures, and Broadway is rich with silks and satins, and sparkling with milady faces and bedizened forms. The theatres and places of public amusement are filled to overflowing, and everything betokens that the coming winter is to be the finest New York has ever seen.

Can this be Nero fiddling while Rome was burning; or is it real prosperity? We are inclined to believe the last. There is really nothing at this time drawing the lifeblood of the country. It is true we have several hundred thousand men who have withdrawn from the labor of the country; but the deficiency has been more than made up by the extra exertion of those left at home and by emigration. Large parts of the country women have turned out by thousands into the fields to do agricultural labor, and by so doing have balanced the loss of the work of brothers, sons and fathers, fighting the battles of their country in the ranks of the Union army.

This is the true secret of our great prosperity: that by some means, notwithstanding the fact that a half million of men have left the labor of the land, our agricultural products have not diminished, and our manufactures have been carried on as actively as before the war. It is the South only that is suffering in this terrible struggle, and not the States of the North. New York, as the natural centre of all this wealth, feels joyous over the prosperity of the rest of the district, though got out through a very small back door—is determined to have her full share and spend some of it.

In these days of war and bloodshed a more single murder is a matter of the greatest interest. Even once it was thought worthy of columns of record in the daily press, now it scarcely excites a paragraph. Such a point is this paltry apathy carried on small excitements, that the Rademaker murder, committed some years ago on the pier-station is unmolested. We have contained instances of the most shameful murderers have got off by their counsel not free, or with only a year or two at the most in State prison. Even the jury has sometimes striken a trifle to keep away starvation, receive a heavier punishment. At this time we have an instance of the uncertainty of the law in the case of Judge Hall, who has been several years in prison under sentence for the murder of Mr. Ward, of Mr. Wallon, and of Mr. Matthews; and also that of Radeiky, the murderer of Mr. Rogers, has been sentenced to hanging. Every one has been convicted and is undoubtedly guilty, and yet they are suffered to escape through some legal flaw, and turned out upon the community, perhaps to commit more murders. Whilst Dr. Cornish, the German physician, who, in the best of position stabbed a man who purposely provoked him, and has by disease and poverty reproached his crime, is to be hung. He has no friends and his lawyers tell him that he should be 10 consciously to be hung for being too poor to buy law. Verily we are a peculiar people!

There is so much that is noticeable and exciting in the present theatrical season that we scarcely know where to begin recording it. Firstly, of that which has been, the Germans have had the Academy of Music. On Monday night we had "Faust," and thousands were turned away unable to obtain admission. Tuesday, a repeat of the opera itself at this late day would be like a critique on Shakespeare, so we had a first-class audience of "Faust." It was successfully produced and several of the artists acquitted themselves in a way deserving more than passing mention. Herrmann as Mephistopheles brought forth the enthusiasm of his audience and received more flattering attentions than the "Evening Star" could possibly bestow. Madame Bertha Johannsen and Madame Frederics both sang splendidly, and the manner in which each one of the artists se must have convinced them that they sang to an appreciative audience.

On Wednesday "Martha" was upon the boards, with the familiar but always welcome refrain. In the second act Madame Johannsen introduced "The Last Rose of Summer," which brought down the house encore. Thursday, "Faust" again, never too often; and this week we are to have Robert le Diable, which will also be given in Brooklyn. There is a rumor that Grumolo's "Martha" is to be produced in English previous to the season quite equal to that of "Faust," and of a more attractive character.

For the handling of his orchestra and his general management, Carl Anschutz deserves more than praise can be given him through this paragraph, and the success he deserves for the grand success he has made, a success which we trust will be the means of putting enough money in his pocket to make him a rich man.

Next comes Max Maretzek, and what he is about to do. Last week Maretzek Monday Italy throws open the doors of the Academy, and Italia resounds with the Teutonic element in its classic dances. Maretzek is quiet in the matter, but it is the list of operas, concerts and old favorites he offers for public suffrage is quite enough to create a furore of excitement among the music-loving public, if nothing more. Carozzi Zucchi, Brambilla, Bertucca, Mrs. Laura Wells, a prima donna soprano, and Morensi, Frida de Gebel and Ferranti, a tenor, are also announced. Ferranti is a rising well. Massimilloni, Lotti, Bellini, Pierini, Brignoli, Amodio, are also announced, and we can believe that the coming season is to be something more than simply promising.

The speculations are to be "Don Sebastiano," Donizetti's last, and highly pronounced the best work of all; "La Forza del Destino," Verdi's last, and "Mireille," which "The Ragpickers," "The Peoples" and "Fra Diavolo," will be revived in a style calculated to astonish the natives.

The director having gone about his business in a business like way, we look forward to a good season of Italian Opera as the most successful ever known in New York, and we hope it will not be disappointed.

Monday last brought forth one of those monster concerts which are the delight of Brooklyn. At the Academy of Music, it was at Jones's Wood, given by "The Musical Mutual Protective Union," and it drew together a crowd of 10,000 to 20,000 many thousands of people. Six hundred performers were engaged, and the programme was a varied and six thousand people—more or less—tripped it on the light fantastic to the time inaugural to a series of monster affairs of the same kind that are to be given for the benefit of the fund, and if we can judge by the success of this, they will succeed.

There is little to record of change in the theatres. At the Winter Garden the Ravels are once more delighting fashionable audiences.

Mrs. John Wood has withdrawn "Miriam's Crime," and replaced it by a three-act comedy by the Countess of Gifford, entitled "Finesse." It is founded upon the historical idea that in 1816, during the English occupation of Sicily, a dangerous conspiracy against them was discovered and defeated by skilful finesse. It has been greatly successful in London, and we shall have more to say of it next week.

At Wallack's a new comic drama Ici, by Bouricault, has been produced, one of which our manager has announced that, in consequence of the public desire for "change and variety," he will occasionally give them a night of a play called "Rosedale." A most fitting joke that.

Heller is astonishing himself and a lot of people by turning about as much money every every night as he takes in. Since his engagement he has had a success that no one in his line ever had before in New York; the only fault to be found is that he should have a larger room, and thereby avoid the crowding that occurs every night. The performance of that band of negro minstrels, with the unpretending name of Sable Brothers, is the best of these days, and is a feature that can only be understood by seeing.

Barnum still has the happy family of the Thumbs on hand, including Minnie Warren and Count Joe Nutt. We are happy to inform all inquiring bodies that Mrs. Charles Stratton's wife is Lavinia Warren; baby is not much like other babies of its age, neither larger nor smaller. Further this deponent saveth not.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The monastery of St. Michael at West Hoboken, erected by the Passionist Fathers, was solemnly inaugurated on the 20th of Sept. It is a very handsome and commodious building, situated in a very romantic spot.

— The Sterligist Coterie Evening Sociable met on the 12th September to reorganize for the coming season, and they will hold their social gatherings at Pfaff's Academy in 14th street. The Sterligist Coterie numbers among its members many of the most elegant and intellectual young men of the day, and who are as noted for moral worth as for personal appearance and accomplishments.

— There was a meeting at the St. Nicholas hotel on the 14th of Sept, to take into consideration the propriety of erecting a Free Public Cemetery. The idea, after considerable discussion, was abandoned.

— The Overland Stage Line to California is to be immediately extended, the hostility of the Indians having ceased along the whole line up to Folsom, Cal.

— The Democratic Convention met in the county at Albany, on the 14th, Mr. Champlin in the chair; he endorsed McClellan.

— The Evening Journal says: Rev. Dr. Evarts, by way of illustrating the inscrutability of Divine Providence, relates a German story of a pious old woman who "The spot in our lake can be pointed out to you where a young lady was drowned last year." The story was one we will talk drowned. He went down, as it was supposed, for his last time, with assistance close at hand. But, to the consternation of all, much difficulty earned to consciousness. Dead men rise to testify in the case of the President of the Insurgent Confederacy—Jefferson Davis."

— The Mayor has written a letter to John Williams Esq., agent of the Peabody Educational Fund, giving him as his opinion that the title of the organization is a misnomer, and should be "called a hall where Democrats pretence to exhibit foreigners."

— The New York political tickets are thus settled:—

Democratic. Republican.

Governor ..... Horatio Seymour. Reuben E. Fenton.
Lieut.-Governor D. R. Floyd Jones, Thos. G. Alvord.
Canal Commiss'r Davis Lord. ..... C. A. Alburger.

— The great billiard match for the championship and the stakes of $2,000 between Dudley Kavanagh, of this city, and Philip Tieman, of Cincinnati, came off on the 19th, at the Academy of Music, and resulted in favor of Kavanagh. The game was a carom one of 1,500 points, and was finished in one and a half. At the close the score stood—Kavanagh 1,500, Tieman 927.

— The Democratic State Convention on the 15th selected the following from Tammany Hall as the regular representatives of the Democracy of the city. The Wood faction, the Mozart Hall organization, the McKeonites and one of the German delegations threatened to withdraw from the Convention. The other German delegation remained in with Tammany Hall. Two withdrawals and one split promised to damage McClellan and the State ticket, and make their fight with Tammany at the local candidates, except the Wood and Mozart delegation, which ignored McClellan and promised nothing.

Western.—Brig.-Gen. Sibley, in an official despatch, says the number of Indians embraced within the territory of Minnesota is nearly 17,000, including 3,200 warriors, of whom 1,600 are now actively hostile, 200 doubtful and the rest, 1,400 friendly—professedly so friendly, but who would not hesitate at any time to raise the hatchet if they considered it for one of the consequences. He recommends as a permanent policy concentrating the military and Indians in the several bands and tribes, adding that "when they find they must come to us or starve upon the claims for food, and must work or starve, they will agree to any reasonable conditions the government may set to them." He says that it is becoming more and more manifest that some such brief policy as that indicated must be adopted by the Government with reference to the great tribes of Indians West of the Mississippi, if a permanent peace can be restored to our extensive border."

Southern.—The Southern press is very much divided in the consideration of Gen. Sherman's swing of their editors declaring that the war will be carried on with more military vigor than ever, and that it has been, and that his terms, as put forth in his letter of acceptance, have been made, there is really no difference between Lincoln and McClellan. Judging from the correspondence of the Northern papers, and we take it they reduce more accurately and vividly the condition of the people and the resources and movements which can be adduced to the writer's fancy, the state of the South must be unspeakably horrible to contemplate, and is a painful evidence how latent the spirit of war and the South is, how deeped in their determination. It will require all the tact of their leaders to prevent the question of a return to the Union, should a favorable opportunity occur.

Military.—Gen. Grant and Gen. Sherman have both been summoned by the President to publish letters urging the immediate enforcement of the draft as the way it will put an end to all false hopes on the rebel side, and also to settle them a victory.

— The remount of the 6th and 7th Connecticut volunteers, now in this city on the Potomac, en route for home, their term of service having expired. They numbered about 1,200 men. After partaking of refreshments at the Battery Barracks they left for Hartford. The original number was 1,400—two regiments of over 2,000—besides recruits. The slaughter of this war already equals that of Cesar's long and eventful life.

Personal.—Gen. T. F. Meagher has been ordered to report to Gen. Sherman for service.

— Parson Brownlow thus epitomes the death of the great orator and statesman, Henry Clay, in short: And when he died a thief and coward expired." He was killed in Mrs. William's back-yard, or cabbage-patch, in the city of Lexington. He was shot through the head by Andrew Campbell, of Company G, 12th Tennessee cavalry, while he was endeavoring to escape. He was a notable friend in front of every horse-stable in the land, in the days of slavery, and all the fast trotting mules should be noticed that they may now appear in the spirit world, and grace in peace in the daytime. Morgan leaves a large amount of good and greenbacks, cotton and real estate, the proceeds of his thieving exploits resulting from untold murders and robberies, through a space of three years. His is legal heir it will be difficult to settle. His first wife was the sister of Colonel Bruce, of Kentucky. She died in Lexington, from neglect and bad treatment of her debased, grabbing and thieving husband. His second wife was the negro wench he had with him during his residence in this city. She is at Memphis. His third wife is the daughter of Charles Healy, of Murfreesboro, and she is at a Bangalow, in Virginia."

Obituary.—Among the many gallant men who at Fredericksburg, nearly two years ago, fell on the field, was N. Y. Vole. This is a fine regiment, being chiefly composed of the 9th N. Y. Vols., better known as Hawkins's Zouaves, which proved itself to be the best volun" of regiments of the war. Thereon mi embarr" ... merged in the 17th N. Y. Volunteers.

— Mr. Matthew Hughes, the well known artist, who has been at Athens for a period with his sketches in Once a Week and various other English periodicals, has left the city of Pallas, and will spend a month at each prefecture that he had lived in would be a most interesting and valuable contribution.

— The Rev. George Potts, D. D., a distinguished Presbyterian clergyman of this city, died at his residence in Jersey City, on the 20th inst., of a paralytic stroke received this summer at Saratoga. He was born in Philadelphia, graduated at that city, at Princeton College, and immediately after took the chair of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pa. He subsequently came to New York and assumed pastoral charge of Duane street Presbyterian Church. His talents were erected a spacious church in University place, where he has since labored with continued acceptability to a large and influential congregation. Dr. Potts has published many valuable works, and ever since his celebrated controversy with Rev. Dr. Wainright of the Episcopal Church, as to whether the church could exist without a bishop, a discussion which grew out of the consecration of Bishop Potter, Church of this diocese in consequence of the Onderdonk difficulty (now happily settled), he has held four children three sons and one daughter. One of his sons is the Rev. John Aiken Potts, of Jersey City. Another, Dr. Potts, is surgeon in the profession of which his father was a distinguished member.

— Park Benjamin, formerly one of the editorial staff of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, and a popular lecturer and poet, died on Monday evening, 19th of Sept, at his house in this city. He was of Welsh descent, and was born at Demerara, British Guiana, on the 14th of August, 1808. An illness in childhood impaired his hearing, and he was totally deprived of sight in his eyes and to his father's home in New England for a year at Harvard College, graduated at Trinity College, Hartford, 1827, began to write poetry at college, and was one of the original editors of the New England Magazine. In 1837 he removed to New York, and in connection with C. F. Hoffman, the American Monthly Magazine, and with Rufus W. Griswold, the International. He once Greeley in editing the New Yorker. He was a most original writer, and was the author, with Rufus W. Griswold, as editor of the New World, a cheap weekly periodical, which had a large circulation among English magazine literature, and received original contributions from many distinguished men. He was the author of the well known lecture on Poetry, which he has delivered in most of the principal towns in the country, both in prose and verse. His poems, which embrace many popular lyrics, have been published, but never been collected, but are found scattered through the several periodical literature of the country.

Accidents and Casualties.—Mr. Clark, of Van Buren co., Iowa, heard a few days since that her husband was killed in the battle of Corinth. A man who had approached him as he was at supper, threw her arms around his neck and kissed him. She then told him that a blow on the head with an axe that he is not likely to recover.

— A man named Lewis was arrested on the 19th of Sept., in New York, charged with forging checks on the American Express Co., at Rhinebeck, of $17,000. The money was recovered.

Foreign.—A Crystal Palace has been opened at Amsterdam with great solemnity, in the presence of immense crowds. The Prussian Minister of Finance, Herr Joseph Fuster's structure of 1851 has been adopted and constructed on the same principles. It is a splendid edifice contrast to most of the public and private buildings in the city of Amsterdam. The King of Holland, Prince Frederick, uncle of the King, presided at the ceremony, and delivered a long speech, replying to the address from the projector, Dr. Sarpathi, whom the Prince decorated with the Order of the Lion of the North Star.

— The French journals inform us of a very charming innovation in the mode of setting dresser on table at very great parties. The old fashion of doing so for reason will barely be extensively adopted: "The fruit, the flowers, the dessert, the table itself, are to be arranged in the form of a garden, with its trees, its shrubs, its flowers, cherries, peaches, grapes, pears, figs, nectarines, and the whole to be finished by growing on dwarf espaliers. The pots standing on silver or gilt stands, and the whole arrangement to be concealed by moss. Each guest will find a small basket, with a pair of scissors, containing a strawberry plant, in full bearing, to be carried away as a souvenir."

— An ingenious trick has just been detected in Paris. A man and woman worked it. The man would go into a shop and buy a trifle, tendering a note of a large amount, for which he paid with a five-franc or ten-franc piece, and received the change. Satisfied with the operation his female confederate would enter and also make a small purchase. Then the man would return, ten minutes, or a few minutes, she would politely ask for her change, and, on the shop-keeper counting out the money, receive any coin from her, she would reply that he must have given her a napoleon, and not a five-franc piece, and put a gold piece with a certain mark on it. On finding that it was a five-franc piece the woman would, of course, give the change with many apologies.

— A very sad event occurred at the theatre of Milan. A new drama, called "Le Sarette," in five parts, was being acted with the best masters, under her first appearance on the stage. The piece was received with favor, and in the second, and at different times rapturously encored. But in the last act, when the unfortunate debutante was carried home by her parents and friends, she was dead.

— The Bishop of London has ordered an inspection of the sanitary condition of the churches in London which are not in good repair.

— The rumor now is that November is the month when the Emperor Napoleon will visit Rome. If he does and it is thought they will meet with the grandest reception that has ever been given to a monarch.

— Four hairdressers have been fined five shillings each by the Leicester (England) magistrates, under the act of Charles II., for having no hair.

— There are to be virandiers appointed to the French regiments. So delighted were the men at the intelligence, that the hands and beppers immediately struck up, "The Camp-fellers are coming."

Art, Science and Literature.—Dr. Von Rehn, Austrian Consul at Athens, according to reports from Rome, which has recently engaged on a series of excavations in the Salluzzi, supposed to be the ancient Rome Street. He was assisted by a band of 36 Arabs, who have been employed in digging out the earth, and laying bare the Acropolis in its entire extent. The surface soil consists of the Cyclopean character, common to the eastern cities discovered by Schliemann at Troy, Mycenæ and Orchomenos. No sculpture of any kind has yet been found, but numerous fragments of pottery, some of clay figures, etc., have been met with. The remains of the Acropolis lay at a depth under a layer of vegetable soil 13 feet in depth.

Chit-Chat.—Waller was engaged in a discussion as to the probabilities of a future state for mankind. "I have," said he, "many anxieties on the subject are agonizing," said he, "but I have one of heaven, and when I shall be at my doubts resolved in this life." "Sir," said a gentleman present, "I am resolved," said Waller, with a solemn air, "they have their necks twisted in a rope."

— A Gascon nobleman had been reproaching his son for his idleness. "I am not idle," said the hopeful young man. "So far from having served me, you have ever stood in my way, for, if you had never been born, I should, at this moment, be the next heir to my rich grandmother!"

THE MACKEREL FISHERY.

MR. CARTER, in his "Summer Cruise on the New England Coast," gives the following account of the mackerel fishery:

"When a fleet of vessel reaches a place where the fish are supposed to be plentiful, the masters take the lead, and the vessel, bringing his vessel's bows to the wind, ranges his crew as upon a whaling cruise of his own, without a mackerel in sight, attempts to raise (school) by threes and fours, and, if successful, heads sloops, with the boat-box outside the rail, and with a tin horn in his hand, and, standing on the bow, blows for the water. If the mackerel appear, he then throw out short hail, and, if they are in the humor, they will be answered. The fish, if they be all right, generally bite freely, and as soon as they are on board the men actively run throw out and draw in a line. As they pull them on board, the fish are thrown into a box, and the bait into a barrel standing beside him. So enormously do they bite, that frequently a hook is caught in fifteen minutes by a single man. Some active young man will haul in many more; but, if he is not careful, he will soon have with a single motion, and repeat the act in such rapid succession that he will soon be actually on the average "by he high line," that is, to catch the greatest number of fish. The fish, when on board, present a curious sight among the sculpturesque and the miniature case, the pectoral fin, the gill cover, the movement which each item exhibits in the strife, are interesting. The fish which are thrown into the box will take the hook, the excitement of the men, and the dazzling noises of the fish in their beautiful and manifold evolutions in the water, arrest the attention of the most careless observer."

LOVE'S ENDING.

SOME years ago a marriage was arranged between Hans Steinman and Marguerite Blaine. Hans was a young and promising merchant, Hans was a banker, and Marguerite's father a laborer. Unhappily the latter, from imprudence or misfortune, became the victim of pecuniary embarrassment. Hans proposed to get the money due to him, and having taken a great share of Marguerite, proposed to cancel the debt, provided the girl's father would give her to him. Hans was with Hans, and give his daughter to him. The bargain was struck, and the girl, unconscious of the plot, who probably thought a rich husband was better than a poorer one. On the wedding day Hans forced his way in to the house where the bridal party were gathered, and invited the bride to dance with him. She was too frightened to refuse, and was compelled to her husband to know what he wished her to do. He got up and repaired to the company to drive out the intruder, who thereupon raised his arm and struck the bride's father on the head, and thus smashed the wreath from the bride's head, and wished her joy. The company was far from being a happy one.

Hans, from motives of jealousy, treated his wife very badly for upwards of five years, when a catastrophe occurred which changed the whole plan. One Sunday evening, as she was returning from Murray, Hans, who had been out in a sailing boat, had a row with a man at the entrance of a road which wound round a precipitous cliff. Hans struck the man, and he threw up carcass, as the rail which guarded the path had been broken away. Hans, seeing that the man fell, and knowing that the first time she was seen alive. Her husband, on hearing of the accident, went to seek her, and supposing that some accident must be the cause of her absence, he went to the place where his wife was found. She was dead, and by her side lay the body of a man, with a knife in his left hand, and in his right the end of a string, the other end of which was round the trigger, he had been shot through the heart.

The verdict was that the man died wrong, probably by mental anxiety. Drunkards, who had never seen Hans before, declared that he was a murderer, and suggested in the dead man, as he lay before him, weltering in his blood, his wife's young love.

A DINNER-PARTY IN NORWAY.

THERE were, perhaps, 150 guests assembled when we entered. I wondered how we were all going to get accommodated.

"I dare say you do not have these sort of dinner-parties in England," said a young lady to me, when I had taken my seat by her side. "We always at such parties stand up to dinner."

My surprise was cut short by being ushered into the dining-room.

As I wished to do at Rome as they did at Rome, I first turned to a little side-table, on which were arranged sandwiches, and wine, and liqueurs, and various other appetite ticklers. I won't describe the dinner: suffice it to say that some sixteen courses fell I would earnestly recommend any one going to Christiana to practise fasting during the previous twenty-four hours, for it requires an uncommon knack to be able to manage it properly. Eat into a wine-glass, a slice of ham, a piece of cheese peas and potatoes on it, for instance. Hold the in your left hand, and your knife and fork will be completely occupied by the clashy people—and cut and eat with your right.

In the meantime, keep constantly drinking with anybody who will let you get your elbow to push forward against you from all sides. And, when you have got your plate full, pay some attention to the study of attitudes. Assume the best posture for preserving your "crusty" in a state of solidity," while at the same time seat to avoid a straddle, as if you were on the deck of a rolling steamer, otherwise you may be astonished even by the company. You must not feel annoyed if, just as you have succeeded in cutting up the chicken and ham into small bite, and have got a mouthful of it ready for the fork, a jolt from behind disturbs the direction a mouthful is taken, and sends it outside your shortlived restaurant of inside.

Neither must you be irritated at feeling that some one is pouring a plentiful of gravy down your back. I spent a glass of wine over a young gentleman's new embroidered vest of scarlet baize, who bumped against me, was the vessel, and I am ashamed to say that I looked hard in another direction, as if I knew nothing at all about the matter. Another piece of advice I would venture to suggest—especially if you dislike using dirty forks—is to bring to keep a tight hold of your own.

Forks are always at a premium, and if you put yours down for one moment, it is ten to one if it again. I cannot suppose the modest stranger's doing anything better than looking on, and getting in his quiet way what not immediate use; for I am convinced that not one of the forty or fifty guests stood out of the sense plus the knife.

When I came, which was over about six, the gentlemen strolled out into the grounds to smoke. The ladies remained in the drawing-room of the Governor, and chatted with the elderly gentlemen. Coffee was then duly appreciated, we returned to the house to dance the evening away. Although the party had then lasted eight hours, it had been throughout a most rational pleasant one, and the time had passed very quickly.

THE STONE OF SILENCE.

WE have many famous Stones in the world—principally to be noticed the Stone of Honor and the Blarney Stone. But we doubt if many of our readers ever heard of the Stone of Silence in the Arabian Nights, the discovery happened in this way:

"Now, Abdallah," said the Caliph, "doing" Scotland was an ambitious to tell his friends on coming home that he had sealed Cerberus, and had seen a Spaniard's head grow, a "gawky" Western Call, who is sent to get "Sir Walter" to write out of adventurous visitors to Scotland, and to disclose his favorite resorts. Abdallah was nothing if not observant, talked, but he contrived the stranger of the unfrequented, and he was rewarded with the lucrative letting out of himself the really remarkable.

"For instance," said he, in his broken English, which it will be our task to render tolerably correct, "For instance,"—a happy thought suggested itself on the spur of the moment—"there is a Stone of Silence standing connected with it is that any one stands upon it can hear no one speak, and no one can hear."

"Indeed!" said the Cockney.

"Indeed!" echoed Abdallah's Islanders.

Upon this the hero of Richmond hill mounted the Stone of Silence, and began to speak in the high falsetto tongue shapes which an enunciation of Gaelic gutturals requires and approximates—fully, at the same time never sounding a note.

He had scarcely opposing he was calling loudly, vowed he could not hear a whisper. Still not quite satisfied with the test he called upon Donald to change places with him, which Donald gravely did.

Donald stood on the Stone and porter began to shout, till the rocks and skies reverberated.

Donald stood unmoved.

Again the Londoner called, but no apparent symptom of audible sensitiveness rose on the stolid features of the imperturbable Celt.

"Donald," said the Cockney, and forthwith taking out his portfolio he sentenced to paper the words not only the most extraordinary that had come under his notice in his "travels," but a sad specimen of the story of the remark of Donald how necessary it was to have to have a guide in surveying Scan.

The echo of Kilburney, which the Irishman said was the good echo in the world if a speaker's wife are you to-day? It would answer: "Pretty well, I thank you." is not to be wondered at that Abdallah, the hero in one own renowned Island of the West; and it shows an ingenuity in the latter to make the most of the latter for gratifying to the very top of their best simple-minded and credulous visitors.

The delight with which Donald recounted the triumph he had played on the credulity he understood by those who know his fondness for ready money and snuff.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

ONCE on a time, not long ago, not so far from Midmorning as it ought to be, a good-natured and belonging tenged, style-selling wife attended social party. Before she started, however, she would check her husband thus:

"Now, Abraham, don't talk so loud!"

"Come, William, don't lean back in the chair that way!"

"Now, William, don't get noisy over there!"

"Say, William, don't you think it's time to go?"

At last forbearance ceased to be a virtue, and the husband, turning to his wife, said: "Now, look here, Sarah, and said:

"I beg pardon of the company; but as my wife insists on being boss all the time, it is right she should have a hearing!"

And he deliberately took off his pants, handed them to her, and sat down in his boots and drawers.

The company was convulsed, and the wife burst into tears. The happy couple soon went home, but neither spoke a word.

How the affair was settled we cannot tell, but the last time we saw the husband he was whistling, and he invited to think she will not again lose in company in a hurry.

DURING the recent freshet near Peterburg, when a portion of the Federal fortifications was submerged and rendered untenable, a soldier on picket duty, while struggling in the water, cried out:

"Say, boys, I'm getting out of my bailiwick!"

That was as cool and self-possessed as Mercutio, who died with a joke on his lips.

"You want a slogging, thats what you do," said a passer-by to a boy in the street.

"I know it, dad, but I'll try to get slong without it," was the reply.

THOMAS, the third son of Bishop Burnet, caused his father great grief by his excesses. One day the Bishop found him in the presence of his son's countenance, asked, "on what he was thinking." "On it myself," was the reply. "History of the Reformation," say you," was the reply.

"I shall be happy to get it," said the father, "though I almost despair of it."

It was ambition, however, and vigorously pursued, the young man at length became a bishop himself, established the rank of chief justice of the common pleas. He died in 1792.

THE celebrated Lessing was remarkable for a frequent absence of mind. It is told of him that, having occasion to write to different times, without being able to discover who took it; he determined to put the history of the matter to the test. He, therefore, left a hundred on

"Of course he counted it?" said one of his friends.

"Counted it!" said Lessing, rather chagrinned; "no, I forgot that."

In a Scotch church, a descendant of Nebal having put a crown piece into the plate instead of a penny, asked to have it back and was refused.

"In once, in for ever."

"Aweel, aweel," grunted he; "I'll get credit for it in heaven."

"Sir, no," said Jeems, the doorkeeper, "ye'll get credit only for the penny."

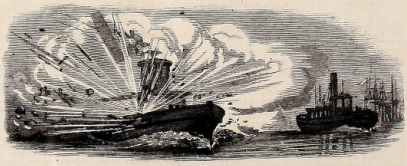
THE WAR ON THE UPPER POTOMAC—GEN WILSON'S CAVALRY FORAGING AT THE SELDEN ESTATE, CLARKE CO., VA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, J. E. TAYLOR.

FORAGING SCENE ON THE SELDEN ESTATE.



Our Artist, who is in the army of Gen. Sheridan, and whose sketches of the rapid and daring movements we have frequently given, sends a sketch which shows why the Shenandoah valley is the bone of contention. The richly stored barns of the farmers are coveted by the starving legions of Lee, and straitened as he is by Grant, he may better meet Grant than famine, and sends Early to gather the harvests. Our armies in their advance also need supplies, and there are plenty who are openly hostile to make the foraging a matter of no reluctance. In the present case, which occurred in Clarke county, Va., on the Selden estate, our men are retaliating for the plunder of Maryland and Virginia.

NEGRO PRAYER-MEETING.

THE negro is devotional. If he seldom rises intellectually to the higher level of the whites, he shows every basis for religious teaching. He is earnest, emotional, reverent. As a class, too, they are not, as the reports of crime show, nearly as troublesome in proportion to their numbers as whites; and they are not represented as fully in our penitentiaries and prisons.

Whom this struggle is over we trust that good men will endeavor to elevate them. The field is a wide one.

Our Artist in Gen. Grant's camp was struck one evening at City Point by the singing of a colored prayer-meeting, and approaching, was so struck by the simple earnestness, real piety and untutored eloquence of Brother John, who led the services, that he could not forbear sketching the scene.

ONE day a physician alighted from his carriage, and entering the shop of bookseller, inquired of the master if he had a copy of "Heberden's Commentaries."

"No, sir," replied the man of letters; "but we have 'Cæsar's Commentaries,' and they are by far the best."

WHITE VIOLETS.

BY AMANDA T. JONES.

My sweetest friend I sought to please;
I led her down a cool descent,
Where trailed the boughs of ancient trees,
Most quaintly bent.

A glen we found all velvet-lined,
Whence, peering fifty fathoms down,
We saw the flashing rapids wind
Through boulders brown.

A light cascade flung crystal globes
O'er dense green moss and slender sedge,
Then flitting on in gauzy robes,
Waltzed o'er the ledge.

Full softly shone, through leaves half-furled,
And filmy, frail, spray-silvered nets,
Those loveliest blossoms in the world—
White Violets.

Oh, pure! oh, fragrant woodland things!
My friend beheld them with delight;
She lightly brushed their snowflake wings,
With hand as white.

"Fair flowers, and is it sweet," she said,
"To dwell in such a glade of dews?"
Then lower drooped her faultless head,
And seemed to muse.

"But human hearts," she murmured then,
"With cause for constant sighs are weighed,
Wherefore we yearn, though green the glen,
For deeper shade.

"And watching foamy water-jets
In mossy woods, we straightway crave,
By their attending rivulets,
A quiet grave."

"Kind Claire," I sighed, "the thought is thine,
Still should I pray for lengthened life,
If but that restless hand were mine,
Its queen—my wife.

"Yet softer sleep could never be
When this my pilgrimage must end,
Than under flowers beloved of thee,
My sweetest friend."

She raised a rapt, transfigured face,
"While blest with love and thee," she said,
"No more shall Claire crave resting-place
Among the dead!"

Low sang the wind through ancient hewers,
Light swayed the gauzy water-jets;
Loving and loved—oh, rarest flowers,
White Violets!

THE SUBJECT FOR DISSECTION;

OR,

THE STUDENT'S RUSE.

BY A. M. H. FREEMAN.

THE class to which I belonged was about graduating. It was near the Commencement, and after we had received our diplomas we were to return to our respective homes fully authorized to practice the healing art. Among the other students that I had associated with were two who had been especial favorites of mine, though both were of entirely different temperaments.

Horatio Westbaven was by a few years the elder of the two. Of a nature warm-hearted, gentle and loving, yet his power of attraction was neutralized by manners so reserved that but few attempted to win his confidence; yet I, by some chance, had become one of the latter, and to me he unfolded the particulars of his approaching marriage with Leonore Montclare, a lovely girl, who at that time resided with some distant relatives living near the borough of M——, at a short distance from the city.

"Now I wish it was all over, and that I had caged my bird and was at housekeeping," he said to me at the close of a confidential discourse in which he had unfolded many of his future plans of life. "I should then immediately enter into practice in our old homestead, which is now being thoroughly renovated and refurnished in anticipation of the coming event. And do you know that I think the coming season will afford rare opportunities to a young practitioner thirsting to acquire reputation and independence? The more so, as owing to the peculiar state of the atmosphere and the influences at work during the war, there must be a large increase of endemics.

"There are now many new phases of diphtheria and spotted fever about, and I have studied the symptoms and management of those classes of diseases so thoroughly and well, that I feel confident I can do good battle against their dread approach. But mind, Ellwood, I shall claim your promise of spending part of your summer at our bijou seaquarry."

And he went on chatting on his future plans—plans in which wealth and reputation formed no inconsiderable part. But as we talked on we little dreamed of the reverse that the next opening of the door would usher in upon us.

From the ascending stairs came the sound of a loud, clear whistle, a ringing laugh, and the heavy stamp of well-nailed boots, and through the opening door walked, or rather jumped, Howard Clay, enveloped in the smoke of a havana, and thoughtlessly ejecting tobacco spittle which flew upon the polished boots of Westbaven. Springing towards me with one bound, he snatched the handkerchief from my breast pocket, and appropriated it to his own use without further ceremony, merely giving me a loud laugh in return for my look of surprise, with an "Excuse me, careful Ellwood, but I know you have plenty of others, while I have run through my last. Cool, decidedly, ain't I?"

"All right," I said, returning his nod, for he had previously [illegible] that he had been too "fast," and being near the end of the term was consequently "hard up," and with all his faults I knew he was one of the few who would almost go through fire or water to serve me; but as I again glanced casually at his face, I was startled at the change in its expression. The joyous look of social hilarity was gone, and a deep crimson flush suffused his face instead.

Following the glance of his eyes, I was soon at no loss to divine the reason of the change. Horatio Westhaven had withdrawn towards the door with a gesture of impatience, and in doing so had glanced at Clair with a look of mingled scorn and disgust clearly discernible upon his expressive face. Knowing him well, I could easily read the reflections of his high, sensitive nature upon what he deemed to be the rudeness of the other. The moment proved embarrassing to me, for I still did not feel very when it was ended by the departure of Westhaven.

"How disagreeably that fellow looked at me!" exclaimed Clair, unable any longer to refrain his pent-up wrath. "By heaven, the scorn in his eyes fairly cut me through and through! Had he not been your friend I should certainly have levelled him, or he should me! As it was I had hard matter to keep my hands off him. Pray what business was it of his? A proud upstart, with his father's moneybags to fall back upon. Be very sure I should never have taken his handkerchief, had there been none other in the city. But never mind, I will have my revenge yet! I will play such a series of practical jokes upon him that he may have an opportunity of getting up a little scorn on his own account too, or I'll miss my time."

I soothed Clair's wounded feelings as well as I could. Reared in the school of adversity, I had learned to give and take, and where I knew the heart was right was not over sensitive as to the rest. The door opened over and I thought no more of it. In fact, the approaching Commencement was the all-engrossing subject of conversation. The graduating class were daily taking up with the discourse of the principal professor upon the last and most important dissection that was about to take place.

The fresh bed of late new and sudden diseases spreading about the country, in which even old and experienced physicians had failed to afford relief, and in which a peculiar form of study the professor had directed our earnest attention, exposing it upon our minds as most likely to form the simplest form of practice for the coming year. To afford us every facility of instruction he had given orders to procure a human subject stricken with the disease, which we were to operate upon, as the patient hitherto through the brief hours of stupor and exhaustion that closed their earthly career.

That day the professor continued to lecture to and exhort us upon the action of the human system upon the heart in cases of sudden disease.

My mind being full of these important studies, I was conversing with another student upon the obsolete theory of the action of the great sorta and ventricles, to which he was much addicted; during our discussion several of the students came in as animated attention, when we were interrupted by the abrupt entrance of Westhaven. He appeared to be laboring under the excitement of some trouble with agitation as his eyes glanced round the circle, as though in search of some one, while he pointed to an open newspaper which quivered in his hand.

"Who could have done this?" he hoarsely exclaimed. What wretch has forfeited all claim to manhood by perpetrating so miserable a trick as this?"

At these words Howard Clair, who was sitting behind me, sprang up with the utmost haste and distant look, but I quickly turned and he met my eye, which bore down the expression of his, calmly yet resolutely. He hung his head, and sinking back in his seat, appeared to be absorbed in the pages of a medical disquisition which he picked up.

Eldridge reached the paper and read the item which had so disconcerted Westhaven, aloud:

"Married, on the last of March, 186—, by his Honor the Mayor of the city, Mr. Horatio Westhaven to Miss Emma Wood, of this city."

Some of the students made vehement protestations of their innocent of the contemptible act the ruse, while others turned their heads to hide the laughter they could not conceal without doing so. Some could while others could not, for Miss Emma Wood was well known to all present as the principal keeper of the boarding-house where Westhaven lived, and was a by no means attractive spinster lady of upwards of sixty, with a shrill, cracked voice and remarkable nose, wearing a green shade over one eye, and usually carrying an ear trumpet.

"I would give one thousand dollars reward to find out the culprit!" raved Westhaven, finally out of breath, after many invectives upon the head of the anonymous joker, and startled out of his usually calm and gentlemanly manner into even rougher language than heedless Howard Clair had ever used.

I stood in anxious thought. Knowing as I did the full particulars of Westhaven's approaching marriage, I could scarcely realize what effect this false announcement would have upon the sensitive girl who was so soon to have become in reality his bride—a young girl, I knew full well, who was dependent upon the coldly extended hospitality of distant relatives; and it had been the secret pride of Westhaven to secure for her the zealously anticipated comforts of a home.

As these thoughts revolved through my mind I wondered what effect the mischievous item would have upon the poor girl, for well I knew the gossiping spirit of the neighboring villages would spread the intelligence of a piece of news so interesting to them; for the newspaper in question was their chief circulating medium. As I glanced at Horatio Westhaven I felt most deeply for him, for I judged that similar thoughts were agitating him, as he leant against the wall in an attitude of despondency, his face wearing an expression of mental anguish, as he wiped the perspiration of excitement from his brow. Feeling thus I could not help looking round upon Howard Clair, whom I felt sure was the author of the mischief. But his face wore an expression of childlike innocence, as he appeared to be still deeply buried in the medical treatise before him, every once in a while reading aloud a note upon the effect of electricity upon the nervous system, and where there appeared to be caught the severe expression of my eye, and he hurriedly exclaimed:

"Do you know that I think the application of strong mustard along the spinal column as one of the first of applications to be used as a counter irritant in spotted fever, as it rouses the normal condition of the brain, with a sudden force of motion."

"Ah, yes," I answered, in a tone he well understood, it being meant only for his ears, "and I think shaving off the head of the rat a straight-jacket, with an occasional dose of cayenne or the use of a fly-blister, might be even yet more efficacious in allaying of the effervescing devility of a too active brain."

He bussed himself with the treatise again, but not before taking a sidelong glance from the corners of his eyes at Westhaven, and I judged, by their mischievous sparkle, that he enjoyed the joke amazingly.

"Well, one thing must be done, without further delay," said I; "the contradiction of this marriage advertisement must be written off at once, and sent to the publishers of the paper. I will do it myself, otherwise the type will be set and the columns filled, and it cannot appear in the next edition."

"Ah, but you forget that so-morrow is Sunday, and there will be no daily paper issued until Monday, so the contradiction will not reach the public much before Tuesday. Hence the refinement of this malice."

So the vexation of the trick having worried Westhaven into a violent attack of nervous sick headache, to which he was subject, there was nothing left for me to do but to send the marriage contradiction and await its publication in Monday's paper.

The next week opened with a drizzling rain, and cold, heavy mist and fog, lasting the effect of making a feel dull and spiritless, continued for some days.

"I understand that we are to have a human subject next week," said Clair to me, as the close of an afternoon; "and I, for one, am getting tired of the professor's eternal paper-maché models."

"I have been at great pains and expense in trying to secure for you a subject for dissection," said the professor, at the close of a lecture. "For such are the prejudices of poor, weak humanity, that the people of this city prefer to keep intact the remains of a corpse rather than save the lives of the living without injury to the body of the deceased. Hence, as a matter for the cause of humanity, the subject in this case had no near relatives, and upon being seized with the epidemic which resulted in her death, those with whom she had resided fled from her in their fear of contagion, that they temporarily left the house while it was undergoing fumigation, thereby leaving the funeral to the discretion of the undertaker, who is an old friend of mine; and he seeing no one particularly interested, had it sent to the receiving vault, in which the coffin, where service it was transferred to me. The house in which the death took place stood alone, at some distance from the village, few inhabitants, and those who had been struck with terror at the sudden deaths, resulting from the spread of malignant typhus and spotted fevers in that locality. So contagious had all the diseases here become that the entire families around had had members swept off at once by their ravages. Many of the people living around had left a hasty retreat, and their fine homes unoccupied, and I understand that the poor girl was hastily shrouded in what was considered to have become her wedding dress."

He then gave us full and particular instructions how to proceed, leaving the case for us to study over by ourselves, as he had to assist in performing a delicate surgical operation, which would detain him until a late hour in the night.

"And mind," he said in conclusion, "be particularly careful in the incision over the heart. I seek every opportunity of confirming my theory of the action of the heart in sudden disease, for, as I have before said, I believe it to be the only organ chiefly affected by atmospheric influence. And I wish to make notes in this case for publication in the forthcoming review."

It was the last night of dissection for the course, and most of the students in the graduating class were anxious to seize the opportunity the professor's absence afforded them for study or relief to little matters which always seem to accumulate towards the close of the session.

Westhaven being still unwell, had retired to rest early in one of the dissecting rooms. There was Dr. Clair, Eldridge, Waltham and myself left to commence the dissecting operation, and they grouped about me although my services were engaged during that night, enough to chill the ardor of the most enthusiastic. The wind blew an equinoctial gale, and splashes of heavy rain occasionally came upon the window-panes as we ascended the steep back stair that led to the professor's private dissecting-room. It was in a long, narrow hall, with high, dormer windows, having ventilators attached to the upper part, through which the wind moaned dismally, sounding every variation between an aeolian harp and a human groan. The floor was covered with dark oilcloth. At one side of the room stood a large cabinet, with glass doors, through which could have been seen skeletons of almost every bird or beast that had name.

Further on were human relics. Here might be seen the tiny skull of the week old infant, side by side with the deformed chest and crooked spine of the untimely dead. Here, also, might have been seen every phase of animal and vegetable life, from the slug to the walrus—colored models of the principal organs of the body, as acted upon while under the different courses of remedial agents; and last, not least, among many other objects of note that were there to illustrate the pathology of disease, hung human skeletons of noted murderers and their victims, whose crimes are not even daily familiarity, coupled with the ardent love of science and humanity, could wholly divest of awe.

That night, I felt the chill, rather owing to the depressing influence of the humid atmosphere or the sympathetic admonitions of the human soul, I felt oppressed by a mental weight upon my spirits. The feeling was not lessened by observing that its effects were shared in a greater or less degree by my fellow-students. All day the dissecting-room had been fumigated by the most powerful disinfectants; in fact the very air seemed charged with pungent aromatics.

Clair and Eldridge placed the necessary instruments and advanced towards the upper end of the room, while Waltham and myself put on the full dress of our profession, for we felt as though we needed all the light that we could get that cheerless night, as gas had not yet been introduced into that portion of the building. Clair and Eldridge approached the dissecting-table, whilst I busied myself in arranging some necessary articles upon an anatomy stand.

While my attention was taken up with these preparations, I was aroused by the sound of a quick altercation going on.

The subject for dissection was still lying within the open coffin upon the table, and the other students were gathered around it in attitudes expressive of deep interest.

"Take hold," said Waltham; "let us lift her out without disturbing the natural position of the body. These were the professor's orders."

Clair made a reply, seen by pushing back the others with a motion of his hand, but stood entirely still, gazing upon the corpse as though he was spellbound. Then, recovering his light, to habitual to his eyes, had entirely left them, and their expression had become sad and earnest, while that tremor of the body was already forced.

"Come, come, we are losing time!" he exclaimed, somewhat roughly.

"Wait a moment, sir," said Waltham. "The sooner the better; for I do not feel in the right spirit to attend to such work to-night."

"Hold back! We will proceed no further—I were almost said I shall not!" in a voice whose altered tones vibrated between persuasion and command. "What!" continued he, in low, changing tones, "cowards! Is there a dozen of tender feeling even I had not thought him capable of, as he bent over the subject, that appeared to thrill his too often heedless being, "I run the mind steel along the interior of this lofty cask; mar with rude hands the faultless symmetry of that marble bust; bare that high, pure brow from the brain that nourished it? Shrink from the task for fear of a womanhood? Great heaven forbids it! No! not for a hundred professors would I attempt the deed. Will and I have proved that I have been in my time; but I am no stoic. I have an absent sister, pure and far as this poor girl has been, and I swear, by her pure memory, that I will not assist in putting knife in this subject!"

"For heaven's sake, do not be raising up private theatricals at our expense!" cried the more practical Waltham. "Here, Bill, to the name of Esculapius, what else are we here to do? I contess that I like the work no better than yourself—but it is one of the necessary duties we must be the Academy this moment—but there is the report to be made out, and we cannot all dodge the subject."

"Leave that to me," said Clair. "It is enough for the benefit of the practice that the wilful felon and murderer are secured to us; those who have basely forfeited their lives by crimes against society can have no claim upon our sympathies, but this case is different. The professor, by his absence, has left us to the full enjoyment of the rights of this lovely form; for the professor has so well drilled every nerve, sensation and reflection of my brain, with so much knowledge of the great secret of life, that I can dissect their full details, that I am morally certain that I need not this last experience to perfect perfection."

"Be it so," said Waltham, "we all need rest this wretched night, and I, for one, have much to attend to before I leave for home."

But Waltham's second remarked, and debated as to the proper course to pursue; finally, after conversing with me, he left the room to summon Westhaven for his solemn share upon the subject.

I accepted a seat to the side of the coffin, while Clair held up the fluid lamp, throwing the full brilliance of its light across it. I stared inwardly, shrank back, gave a low, faint glance within, and as I again looked upon the face and form of the intended subject, the nameless thrill that shot through my nerves at once bore me nearly marvel as to its effect upon Clair. It seemed to me that it held me bound by the same spell of terrible fascination, for I felt as if not one hour ever fair to look upon, but there were strange, startling symptoms about it that troubled and oppressed me then, but which, through the course of my further practice, I could better account for. The jetty bands of hair were smoothly parted from off the marble brow, and white buds and blossoms were interwoven among the heavy braids. The bridal dress of white silk was made low in the corsage, and rushes of soft, delicate lace shirred the white neck and rounded shoulders. The shortened sleeves did not hide the contour of the shapely arms, and the unglored hands were simply folded across the bosom, displaying the engagement ring whose brilliant crimson stone caught and reflected hues of a thousand dazzling rays from the light of the lamp held by Clair. But the face—the face—it was the effect of that above all the rest that for a time held my tongue spellbound, as during his emotion, I stood looking over the shoulder of Clair.

We had stood together, and gazed upon the face of the dead, when borne from many a scene of panic and terror; upon many who had lost life suddenly or hurriedly, both through disease and the accidents of machinery and workshops which are of so frequent occurrence in a large city, but never had I looked like this. Calm and peace of death were not there! The jet black arching brows were set in a deep frown, while a look of accusation and terror seemed to rest the whole expression of the face, yet blended with a sort of appealing interest I can scarcely describe, but it left to me at the time like the spirit of a Nemesis.

"See there!" I whispered to Clair, still under my breath; "look at that purple spot upon the left cheek!"

"Petechiæ," he murmured.

"Do you want to know what I think?" he looked quickly around, evidently startled at the tone of my voice. "This subject has never come to a natural death. The agonized contraction of that young brow was never the result of the undued exhaustion that invariably succeeds acute suffering. The strangely set teeth under those parted lips are not the results of a sign for speedy dissolution—and feel, the arms are still quite limber!"

"But I thought that," replied Clair; "but chopchere is Eldridge at the door, bringing in Westhaven; I will stand back, get his opinion, he was always sharp and quick at diagnosis."

Clair stepped aside as Eldridge and Westhaven advanced towards the coffin. The former was explaining the position of affairs to the latter. I glanced inquiringly at Westhaven as his face was very pale, and the usually gentle expression of his eyes had given place to a look of deep trouble; impulsively I reached out my hand and drew him to my side, whispering:

"Look!" I cried, "she does not look as though she died a natural death. Mark that expression of wild terror! See how the hair rises on the scalp."

And I looked eagerly in his face to see if his impression would coincide with my own. He turned his face slowly as though accompanied with other thoughts, then wildly started back and took another look—a look of such terrible, heart rite agony, that I was startled to get his expression till my dying day. Then with a wild, fierce cry, he bowed his head over the body, crying out in tones of sorte suffering:

"Leonore! Leonore! my murdered bride!"

And as we, who stood round, beheld his terrible anguish, we felt as by intuition that this was indeed the sacred bride rumor had so long spoken of his affianced wife. With an aching heart and tearful eyes I passed my arm around him, trying to offer the mute support words failed to give.

"Leonore! oh, Leonore! have they bowed your sensitive spirit to the dust? Have they at last broken the heart I was no longer there to uphold? Did your trusting confidence at last fail? he cried, with touching emotion, as he bent down for a brief period, forgetful of everything but the weight of sorrow.

Yet as he gazed upon the painfully contracted features before him other and stronger emotions succeeded that of mere mourning love, love so wildly, that I began to fear that the shock would unsettle his reason.

Show me the cowardly wretch who has birded that false marriage announcement upon her unsophisticated ear, that I may lighten the load of my soul by taking vengeance on him, or that he may receive from my hand work by which he will rest too—for I no longer wish to live. Life to me has for ever lost all attraction."

And he struggled on my arm with the strength of a madman.

"I will hunt him through the world!" he cried.

Hardly had the last words left his lips, when Clair, who had listened horror-struck at their import, rushed forward to his side.

"Hear me, Horatio Westhaven!" he cried, "it was I! I alone wrote that false advertisement. None other shall suffer for my misdeeds; great was the wrong, and bitter my repentance—but take your vengeance!"

"Away, fool! do you not see the state he is in? Add not daring to folly!" I exclaimed, as with my disengaged hand I endeavored to push Clair away, but too late, for Westhaven was already closing upon him, and a struggle was literally commencing over the coffin.

"Help! help!" I cried, as I found that all my efforts to separate them proved unavailing. Eldridge—Waltham—we will you have me stand under your very eyes? Do you not see that Clair is almost suffocating? Great heaven! be quick!

They came forward, trying to separate the two who now seemed wrapping on a mortal struggle, but in the sudden re-bound the burning lamp was thrown upon the body in the coffin, and the next instant the light face was all ablaze, as the hair so fluid ran over the neck and bosom of the lost Leonore. At that awful sight, Westhaven relaxed his hold and Clair fell, unconscious, from the frenzied grasp. Shocked from his temporary madness at the scene, tears came to Westhaven's relief as he endeavored to assist me in subduing the light flame from the body still so dear to him. Gently quashing me aside, he bent down, and with his linen handkerchief carefully wiped the remains of the fluid from the scarred neck; then with sudden impulse, he clasped the body to his heart, and pressed a wild kisses upon the purple lips. Then with a nervous thrill he started back, looking at be face with a gaze that made me doubt his sanity.

"She lived she lives!" he cried. "Oh, for the sake of heaven, bring restoratives—restoratives!"

I gave one wild look of doubt—it was even so. The apparent dead was restored to life, as many had been before, and may be yet again, in seasons of panic and consequent premature interments.

Westbaven stood beside the coffin, leaning upon his breast; supported by his encircling arms was his lost joy, his dead Leonore, restoring to every nerve, yet with strongly increasing powers of respiration, strangely yet surely coming back to life. Her long, deathlic trance at last was suddenly terribly broken, by the momentary agony of the burning fluid so awfully spilled.

We soon applied the most powerful restoratives the Materia Medica affords, and had the satisfaction of seeing the fair girl fully restored to the possession of all her faculties, though still weak, and suffering some pain from the action of the fluid upon her neck and shoulders.

"Then you were not married after all? Thus like a fearful dream!" were the first words she fell from her lips.

"Never will be to any but your own dear self, my Leonore. The thought that I could ever intend to contradict the false report has well-nigh driven me distracted. The presentiment of trouble never for a moment left me. How could I live without you?"

The drooping head pressed closer to his bosom, while the white hand tenderly clasped his encircling arm, the dark brown orbits, and the despairing agony the had darkened the young face gave place to true and love.

"Oh, it seems so weak in me to believe it even for an instant, but I was not myself. I had caught the fever while tending the bedside of a dear neighbor, and my nerves were unstrung. So I was getting better when they brought the news, and showed me the advertisement. The shock was too great for my unsettled nerves, and I swooned away, and lay without power or motion, yet feeling a terror within me that knit my brows, and clenched my teeth and hands like an iron vice. Like a horrible nightmare, and yet not like a nightmare, for I was still keenly alive to everything that was going on about me. Though susceptible to every sound, I was also seized by the stagnation of power that clogged my nerves with loss of action. Oh, the terrible memory of those dreadful hours. The suffering of a lifetime seems compressed within their space. The horror with which I heard the students decline to disect me—even that was a relief—and the compound with a living death in a tomb—besides being then my only hope of resuscitation. Oh! the terrible effort of agony that will I made to move the sluggish current of my blood! Ah, while the dreadful memories rise fresh upon me, promise me—promise me one thing?"

"By all my hopes of heaven I promise."

"Promise that when I seem to die never to bury me until decomposition actually commences to take place."

"Never, my Leonore! You shall never leave this earth until necessity alone demands the sacrifice. And your terrible experience may be the means under Providence of saving the lives of others in these days of sudden epidemics and hasty interments."

And the pair so terribly restored to each other were soon comfortably accommodated by the professor's wife, who had been summoned from the adjoining house, and we carried the covered bier that held the light form of Leonore through the commanding doors in the back entrance, thereby hushing up the matter from public curiosity, which it was our rule always carefully to avoid.

The professor's family extended a hospitable welcome to the affianced bride of Horatio Westhaven, and the orphan girl was soon surrounded with all the evidences of a refined and kind happiness; under its influence and the watchful love of him who declared he never more would be separated from her, she soon regained health and strength. The benevolent professor himself been the most surprised of the party, and thenceforward his favorite study was said to be that of suspended animation.

A short time afterwards the marriage of Horatio Westhaven and Leonore Montclare was solemnised at the residence of the professor. And upon that occasion, amid the social enjoyments of the evening I had the satisfaction of reuniting the broken bonds of peace between bridegroom and Howard Clair, who humbly and, I believe, truly promised to have done with mimes both practical and unpractical for ever. And, I believe, that was the last, as it was the worst of his many attempts at practical jokes.

Shutting After Youth.—Women never make so much mistake as when, in defiance of wrinkles, crowsfeet, and increasing prettiness of outward they sing, as it were, to the skirts of youth, and refuse to be anything but girls of the maturer, decay, position. Yet so many will do it; so very many, especially of those who have reason to remain single, think that to be admired, or even esteemed, they must keep down the charming exuberance of 30, and never, on any account, even to being out of their teens. This is partly the result of the feminine friends, who, being linked by white ties innumerable, have not the courage to break them, and have a general impression that 18 crowns woman's highest earthly perfection. Of course, to be neglected by the sterner sex is not to be single, but the other big fallacy remains that, to be married or growing, the more size thinner is necessary to trip and glide about with the light and airy scraps of. All the looked prove when she felt grave, and laughed to do the very moment; when merry, she walked slowly: when disposed to be silent, she held her tongue; but all of the symptoms, lest people should think her youth fading; shivers in uncomfortable costumes; last age should be supposed the cause of proper and comfortable clothing; and chatters and giggles continually, because that is her idea of juvenility.

A lady, more favored with fortune than education, at a soiree which she lately gave, desired her daughter to play. "Her daughter was ready, she got from London last week." The pretty girl obeyed, and it was very confusing.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

BY THOMAS POWELL.

The human soul's the certain man,
And Christ the Good Samaritan;
Jerusalem's the spirit's home,
And Jericho the world we roam.
Our passions are the thieves that fall,
Leaving the bleeding soul half dead.
The priest is stern morality,
Who grand against, and then passed by.
The Levite is the type elect
Of the human intellect.
How can priest and sage impart
Life blood to the kindled heart
Christ, the Good Samaritan,
Saw and saved the dying man!
Below was all the sin and grief—
Wine was prayer which strength restored,
And the beast on which he rode
Was human mortal, though he saved.
For 'tis Jesus who can make
Man bear sorrow for his sake.
The inn he took to was the house of mind,
And the two pence he left behind,
The Sacred Scriptures, Old and New—
The best to help the weary true,
And should they more than prompt spend,
They to the Lord and Saviour lend,
And when He comes at Judgment Day,
The Lord is just—He will repay.

THE GENTLEMAN WITH THE CAMELLIA.

I was going one morning from Southampton to London. I had the carriage to myself as far as Kingston; here a little man got in who at once attracted my attention by the peculiarity of his dress, appearance and manner. He was a seeming dress, everything about him, from the silk-faced dressecoat to the fine patent leather boots, being brand new. A glance was enough to see from being unconscious; each of his garments, in its turn, attracted his notice and approving smile.

The only thing about him that violated evening etiquette was his necktie, a blue one, negligently arranged in the manner of a rolling collar.

From this I argued that he was not a lord, for turndown collars were by no means so common then as now; the fashion prescribing terrible gills, which, in after-dinner conversation, were the terror of their whiskers and ears. My surmise was confirmed by his long hair, its natural tendency to curl having combated by the daily exhibition of grease, and probably by assiduous brushing.

His face, however, was somewhat against my theory; instead of being a pasty pale, with eyes "in fine frenzy rolling," it was round, plumping like, and rosy; his little eyes deeply set in tunnels of fat, which, at the slightest from time to time, were half closed by his rising cheeks. His head seemed to view a mere shi; his nose short, turned up, and garnished at the top with six or seven curly hairs; his mouth small, and his teeth in very good; fortunately, as he showed them all, not even concealing the wisdom teeth, which were not quite come above.

He was well made, what there was of him; he was not much above five feet high, rather disposed to be corpulent.

In his button-hole he wore a magnificent white camellia, which, I regret to say, I saw, admired, coveted, and determined to possess, by fair means, if possible, if not, by foul.

The flower, too, attracted much of his attention; he bestowed frequent glances upon it, muttering what I conceived to be poetry, inspired by the purity and delicacy of the flower.

I was considering how I might best commence a conversation which would lead to me the precious graces of this gentleman, and ultimately make me the possessor of the camellia, when he saved me the trouble of breaking the ice by saying:

"Candidly, sir, what do you think of my tailor?"

I replied that I had not the advantage of knowing him, a circumstance which I regretted the more, as his work showed him to be a master of his seemen ability; I added, that he was fortunate in having so client whose figure and air would set off garments, even though dressed with less consummate skill.

He acted to look modestly unconscious, and said:

"And who, sir, may this client be with the distinguè figure and air? As you say that you do not know my tailor, I am at a loss to imagine how your truly flattering observations were addressed to me; but my figure, though not deformed, is small, that is to say, rather under than above the average size; and as for my air, though I flatter myself that I possess some of that je ne sais quoi which distinguishes a man like you and me from the vulgar herd, still neither my figure nor air is worthy of the very glowing eulogium which you have bestowed upon them. No, sir, really; no indeed, sir, really," and he looked down, closed his eyes, and cast glances on his little round limbs of more than parental fondness. I perceived that he was not insensible to flattery, and did not desspair of obtaining the camellia by fair means.

"I should apologise," said I, "for so personal a remark; it is entirely from unconsciously; but you must have heard it frequently from the lips and seen it in the eyes of the gentle sex. You are not insensible to the admiration you excite in your eye; nay, that camellia in your button-hole proves you to be the happy bondman of some black-eyed houri."

"How did you find that out? You must know something about me; you might have guessed that I was in love; but how did you find out the color of her eyes?"

"Well, I did not know positively. I thought it likely, most in accordance with the eternal fitness of things, that you, who have taste, should be enslaved by black ones. Was I right?"

"Well, I can hardly tell you; I trust you may be right; but the fact is, I have never seen the lady's eyes."

"Never seen her eyes! Ah, I see; a mysterious courtship, truly poetic, veiled lady, gentle voice, white hand, one raven lock just peeping from its concealment, fairy form, taper ankles, little tiddly-iddly foot."

"Sir," said he, grasping my hand, "we are kindred spirits—you have the divine afflatus—you have struck the wild harp and burst into the inspiring melody of song. We are poets, sir—brother poets. Here, sir, is a bunch of the confidence reposed in me, I would tell you the history of our loves, our hopes and our sorrows."

"You forget that, so long as you conceal the lady's name there can be no breach of confidence. She is the unknown quantity; let X represent her."

"Not X; I shall have to repeat her name often in the course of my narrative, she would then become a double, treble, or even quadruple X, and she is not stout."

"Well, then, let Y represent her; it is a slender and graceful letter."

"Good; let Y, for the moment, represent, unworthily, the name of my adored charmer. I am a poet, sir, as you have already perceived, and not altogether unknown in the public ken in the 'Poets' Corner' of the Trottingbury Mercury, exegi monumentum aere perennius! You may have seen some of my productions in that journal, signed 'Beta.'"

"I will just repeat to you my 'Ode to the Morning.'"

"Pray don't take the trouble; I know the poem by heart, and recited it only last week to D——, at the Athenæum Club. Just now I am burning with impatience to hear your story."

"You shall have it, my friend. I had scarcely ventured to hope that the weak breathings of my muse had penetrated as far as London."

"Why, my dear sir, there are six copies of the Trottingtem Mercury on the table of the Athenæum Club, and it is difficult to get hold of one of them for no one reads any part of it but the 'Poets' Corner.'"

"Not Trottington, Trottingbury Mercury. Well, I'll go on with my story: One evening, I had just finished my 'Imitation of Amerceus,' and had taken them to the office of the Trottingbury Mercury. The last feeble flicker of twilight was fading into the more solemn darkness of night. There was a holy stillness, a quiet calm about the hour that seemed to soften the heart, to prepare it for the reception of love. In front of the office of the Trottingbury Mercury is a garden. There, roses should vie with geraniums, the graceful lily should contend with the fair dahlia—work, and she stately lily should be there in the pride of her virgin purity, but, I regret to say it is planted with cabbages. In this garden there are two gates. I was going down the path leading to one of them, and repeating a beautiful stanza of my own composition—(I never read the works of other people, for fear of unconsciously stealing). As I was going down this path I chanced to look towards the other gate; a fairy form was passing through it. I could perceive at once the beauties of that glorious vision. I rushed straight across the garden in chase, but the potato-stalks tripped me up, and I fell flat on my face. My hat was incapacitated from further pursuit. I limped back to the office and asked the clerk:

"Was that divine creature who has just left your office?'

"That,' said he, grinning, 'is a contributor to our 'Poets' Corner.'

"She is a genius, then; I knew it must be so. What is her name?'

"'Won't do,' said the clerk, with his tongue in his cheek; 'that's the unknown lady.'

"Baffled in my inquiries, I returned to my couch, but not to sleep. That vision still haunted me. I thought of her all night. Evening by evening, the taper ankle, the tiddly-iddly feet. Evening after evening did I lie in wait before the office in the hope of seeing her again, but in vain. Things went on so for a month, and every day I fell deeper in love, my appetite diminished, and I lost nearly two pounds in weight. At length a happy inspiration struck me. I would put my soul in poetry, and I would tell my love in the 'Poets' Corner' of the Trottingbury Mercury. She was a poetess—she must see it. Next week my poem which exists between kindred minds would tell her that she was the object addressed. I wrote the lines entitled 'A Morning Twilight Scene.' Never in my most inspired moments had I so successfully portrayed the inward workings of the tender passion, for I did not know whom to inform, now I felt them. I will just repeat you these lines:"

"Pray don't, sir; I remember them well."

"I knew that she to whom they were addressed would read them and reply; and I was not deceived. The next time I went to the office the clerk said:

"'There is a letter here—meant for you, I suppose.'

"It was directed: '——Beetroot, Esq., contributor to the Poets' Corner of the Trottingbury Mercury.' The dear girl evidently did not understand Greek, and by the similarity of sound was led into the very parallelogram. At length she wasn't a blue-stocking, and I rejoiced at it.

"To make a long story short, we commenced a correspondence, but have never met; but this day she has given me an appointment at Purnell's, the pastrycook, in Cornhill. It is in honor of this appointment that I wear for the first time those garments, the fitting of which you so complimented."

"And the camellia?" I suggested. "Don't you think that a budding rose would be more emblematic of your rising hopes? If so, I think I could manage to get you one."

"By no means; I should have told you that is our signal for recognition; we are each to wear a white camellia over the heart."

How truly has it been said that the first step in crime is a lie. Here was I, a Sodalis ad decorum aus Aternd. I had begun by coveting the one camellia, and resolving too blam it by fair means, if possible. I now resolved to resort to the foulest means, if necessary, for its capture, and to use it as a decoy to obtain the other white camellia now in the possession of the poetess of Trettingbury. To what a precipice was my passion for white camellias hurrying me!

As it was essential to prove his identity in the coming rendezvous, it was evidently useless to try to persuade him to give it to me; my only chance was to steal it, or take it by force.

Calling his attention to passing this watch remarked, I incisively severed the stalk with a tap from my cane, and slipped the flower into my pocket, unperceived.

I then said that, though I had read and learned by heart the contents of the 'Poets' Corner' in the Trottingbury Mercury, it would still be a treat to hear some of these chefs d'œuvre repeated by the author.

He needed no pressing. Without once thinking of his camellia, he favored me with an uninterrupted stream of poetry till our arrival at Waterloo station. I then took a hurried leave of him, pumped into a cab, and, transferring the camellia from my breast to my buttonhole, drove to Purnell's to complete my conquest.

We soon arrived there. Being in a capital humor, I gave the cabman a sovereign for his fare. But what!—how is this? I tried to recollect one after another; no purse; the cabman began to eye me suspiciously.

"My good man," said I, "I find that I have lost my purse, but my portmanteau is a sufficient guarantee for the payment of your fare. Drive me to Lincoln's Inn Fields, I have a friend there who will lend me some money."

The cabman saw the justice of my remark, and drove me to Lincoln's Inn Fields, where my friend received me with open arms, and placed his purse at my disposal.

The journey was rather an expensive one for me, for never was my purse going to run, and my watch and a valuable gold snuff-box. It appeared that the poet and I had been intent on similar designs; but what attentions, and attention extended no further than white camellias, I will not take to enhance for articles of value and current coin of the realm.

It is needless to add that I did not return to Purnell's, that I never saw the pastrycook, nor have I ever again met my friend the poet.

SIR HUMPHREY DAVY AND HIS WIFE.

There was always a great deal of the fine gentleman about the chemist—almost too fine for the quiet scenes of his after life. Those brilliant scenes of his professional career at the Royal Institution of Trottingham, where he was turned out from, to carry him to that stage of social instruction under which he was dubbed into marrying a wealthy lady of fashion and consequently blue-looking, fashionable Mrs Apreece.

Such unpoetic comfort ever came of the marriage. Yet he was a chivalrous man, and took the issue calmly. It was Shakespeare—"My dearest Davy," said Mrs Apreece, "I have suffered much." But these expressions always wound the tender passages. It was altogether a gentlemanly affair, and quite calm. Only once, in a fit of mind, he forgets himself in an honest repining; it is in a letter to his mother, under date of October 24, 1812: "To add to my annoyances, I find my house, as usual, after the interregnum made by the absence of it, without female servants. But in this world we have to suffer and labor, and from many of these no humble mortals, domestic discomfort seems a sort of publican-house."

If only Lady Davy could have seen this Xantippe touch, I think her daughter-in-law would have taken to singing in some quiet country place for a month thereafter. But when she did write, it was with the bantered, and when, striking by the palsy, he is lettering from London to Rome, from Rome to Geneva, "I am glad to hear of your perfect restoration, and with health and the desire of exertion, which you are so fond of on account and enjoy, your verse in fabricis" is much more characteristic of the man and the wife.

And again: "You once talked of passing this winter with us. I hope your plans will be entirely guided by the state of your health and feelings. Your society would undoubtedly be a very great resource to me; but I am afraid that you will find my own present life for society, that I would not have you risk the chance of an intermittent fever on account of it."

The dear Lady Jane must have had a penchant for society by which the poor palsied man to tickle his lonh about!

And once again, in the last letter he ever writes, dated Rome, March, 1829, he gallantly asks her to join him. It began: "I am still alive. Though scarcely every hour to be released."

And the dying Jane, who is washing off her fashionable humors in the fashionable waters of Bath, writes: "I have received your letter, dear Humphrey, the letter signed by your hand, with its precious wish of tenderness. I wish to answer you in the same manner, but my Drs. Babington and Clark tell to-day. . . ." Poor Jane! And kerry Davy, the father of half a page of what your fame is a deposit and your memory a glory, your life still a love.

Sweet Lady Jane! Yet they say she mourned him not. Yet they say she put palsied man to bed with his book about!

Regeneration of Bone.—M. Sedillot has reported to the Paris Academy of Science the result of various operations on bones by longitudinal resection. The object of which was the leaving intact as much as possible to periosteum capable of preserving to the limb its length, without destroying the more important muscular insertions, and where one side of the bone, after the regeneration of the bone, the elements of a complete osteoplastic periosteum. In the osteoplastic trans-formation of the plasmatic cellules of the periosteum and of the medullary canal the layer. By this operation upon a dog between 10 and 15 years old, and in whom a tibia presented a false joint, the bone was completely modified, not the slightest trace of consolidation having been observed. When the dog was removed bone was replaced by a simple ligamentous cord. M. Sedillot thinks that more than half of the bone of the femoral diaphysis had been successfully removed by longitudinal resection, the bone was regularly and easily regenerated. He hopes soon to publish still further successful results of his method of operation.

Shakespearian.—"All's well that ends well" is the gentleman said when he wrote the postscript to his letter. "Meaning for measure," as Dr. chemist said when he took a bad, sixpence for a black draught. "All's well that ends well," as the servant said when he drank his master's grog. "A winter's tale," as the bewhiskerden said when the pumper asked for some coals.

DEAD.

BY ADA VROOMAN.

All tranced and pale I stand,
And hold thy marble hand,
In fearful wonder that thou dost not speak:
Oh, best beloved, hear!
Know'st thou that I am near?
Or hast thou grown too dying, faint and weak?

Too late! oh, heavens, I rave!
Appareled for the grave,
Thou lest here in dreamless calm and rest;
Immortal life is thine,
Thou art no longer mine,
But His, the starry King of all the blest.

Thine eyes' sweet violet
In death's dark night has set,
Thy rose-red lips no more will ape thy name,
But clasped in death's embrace,
Then turnest thy dear face
Towards the mystic bourne from whence the mandate came.

But oh, my love, my own!
How could'st thou die alone?
Without my voice to cheer and comfort thee.
Did the Messiah stand
And hold thy trembling hand,
Until God's glorious face thy weary eyes could see?

Oh, for one last caress!
One more to clasp and press
This broken lily to my breast, and say,
"Dear love—now all divine—
If look or word of mine
E'er wounded thee, forgive me, now, I pray."

But I, who loved so much,
No more have right to touch
This holy thing, now God's, and God's alone;
For up in heaven she stands,
Clasping her radiant hands,
Among the saints that gather round the Throne.

NINA MARSH;

OR,

THE SECRET OF THE MANOR.

CHAPTER XIII.—"SUCH A GHASTLY OUTRAGE."

THE three Misses Grimaldenne were much sought after in Bathwick, because their time was always at the disposal of any one who desired to make profit out of their accessibility. If an impromptu rubber was to be organized, you had only to send for one of them. As their hair was put on ready dressed, their toilets were soon made, and there were at your disposal in a few minutes. Besides, they were what may be called "evening-eyes." They never won enough to create envy, or lost enough to excite pity; consequently, they were neither unpleasantly triumphant nor painfully disconcerted, and people liked to play with them on this account. But it occasionally happened that the three Misses Grimaldenne were so fascinated angrily about Balnwick, each having an especial invitation of her own.

On the evening in question the two elder ladies had joined a small social gathering at Mrs. Sturt's, in order to celebrate this lady's sixtieth birthday, while Amoross had accepted an invitation at Mrs. St. George's, to meet Mr. and Miss Mervyn for the last time previous to their departure for the south of England. Now, as Amoross had certain designs upon Mr. Mervyn, she gladly put aside the other engagement in order to be present at Mrs. St. George's quiet reunion. Knowing that Mr. Mervyn liked punctuality, and thought it an especial and rare virtue in womankind, Amoross skilfully managed to enter Mrs. St. George's drawing-room precisely as the clock struck eight. She gaily drew attention to the fact.

"Punctual, as usual, my dear Mrs. St. George."

Mrs. St. George smiled her own little wily smile. She understood Amoross as well as if she had adopted the proposition of Momus, and owned a window in her bosom, through which the workings of her diabolic mind could be seen. But the failure or success of the sanguine spinster's schemes was a question of no moment to Mrs. St. George, so that she had her rubber; only then looking from Amoross to Miss Mervyn, simple and unpretending, with a cloud on her sweet, gentle face, which came inward sorrow or perplexity, Mrs. St. George decided that they two could never make a home together, and rather hoped, for the sake of the latter, that Amoross's plans might not prosper. Still it was not her business to set any obstacles in the way. The principle of her life had always been to take care of herself and let others take care of themselves, and she was not likely to abjure her doctrine for the first time at the age of three score. Her perfect indifference and impunity gave her the advantage of watching the game for the sake of amusement alone, and should any interest or her own intervene during the contest, then would it be time enough to interfere. So settled Mrs. St. George as she shuffled the cards and drew her chair to the table, round which her three guests had been standing, with their teacups in their hands.

It was one of the Balnwick by-laws that no one should indulge in five-o'clock conversation during the game, but perfect immunity in this respect was generally granted at the termination. This evening it succeeded rather with pleasurable regularity until about eleven o'clock, when sandwiches and wine were brought in, and Mrs. St. George, pocketing her moderate winnings, rose from the table. Then Amoross gave a playful dart at the refreshments.

"I'm so hungry!" she exclaimed, making two bites of her sandwich.

"Madam," said Mr. Mervyn, with formal courtesy, "you are greatly to be envied. I have always at this time a painful shaking sensation in the region of the chest; but my legs being so miserably inadequate to the support of my body, I am obliged to deny myself any refreshment, for fear of increasing the bulk of my wretchedly pondérous frame. It is a subject of absorbing interest to me as to what available locomotive means I shall have when my unfortunate person has still further encroached on the legitimate boundaries."

"Oh, Mr. Mervyn, how can you talk in that way? Your understanding is really beautifully in proportion."

Mr. Mervyn sighed mournfully.

"My dear lady, you need not spare me. I am quite sensible of my deficiencies, and am, I hope, resigned."

"But, sir, excuse me," answered Amoross, with a tender light in her sea-green eyes, "I have always heard you spoken of as an object of envy rather than compassion."

"To those who have not sufficient penetration to pierce below the surface, I may appear a fortunate individual, but to others with more discernment I must be regarded as an unhappy object indeed."

"I know you had some secret sorrow," replied Amoross, in a tone of the deepest sympathy.

"I have, madam," said Mr. Mervyn, pathetically, and, strange as it may sound, my grief lies entirely in my—"

"My dear sir, why harp upon that miserable theme? You are making a serious mistake, indeed you are. I can show you how serious, only mind that my little confidence is strictly for your ear, and would not be made did I not know you to be the most modest of men. I heard it the other day."

"Heard what?" said Mr. Mervyn, who, in addition to being extremely nervous, was nervously anxious as to the effect he created.

"You wont tell, really?" said Amoross, confidentially.

"On my honor, madam; and though my unfortunate peculiarity may render me ridiculous, it can never destroy my honor."

"Ridiculous? Ah, Mr. Mervyn!"

"Yes, ridiculous. I speak advisedly. Any freak of formation out of the rules of nature is ridiculous to an ordinary observer. I have felt this acutely for years past."

"My friend," said Amoross, sinking her shrill voice to a whisper, "I am sure you are making a serious mistake. Nature has been most bountiful to you."

"You bountiful in paris," sighed Mr. Mervyn.

"Not at all," answered Amoross, indignantly taking his part against himself. "My opinion is the general opinion. I heard two ladies discussing it the other day."

Mr. Mervyn pricked up his ears and grew red in the face with eager expectancy.

"And one of them said you were the finest figure of a man she had ever seen; and the other remarked that you were the image of George IV. in his younger days."

"Nonsense!" said Mr. Mervyn; but there was no mistaking the look of gratification in his face.

"It is the truth, sir, I assure you, and the resemblance had struck me before, only it seemed so like flattery I hardly liked to say it."

"Don't let there be any more of this reserve between us again," said Mr. Mervyn impressively. "I feel greatly indebted to you."

"Then why don't you propose?" thought Amoross.

"And if there is anything in the way of commissions I can do for you in London, I shall be most delighted."

"Then you are going to leave us?"

"Yes; I am going with my sister to make a brief stay at Boulogne-sur-Mer, previous to my return in the course of a few days. And now, as Miss Mervyn has finished her interesting conversation with Mrs. St. George, I will reluctantly bid you a very good-night."

Mr. Mervyn bowed over Amoross's hand with elaborate courtesy, gave Mrs. St. George a formal adieu, and then with carefully downcast eyes, his sister, who had been too absorbed in present perplexities to perceive Amoross's designs, following him quickly in the hall.

"Is my chair come, I wonder?" said Amoross, helping herself to her eighth sandwich and recollecting her absent chair.

Mrs. St. George rang the bell and summoned her page. After making the necessary inquiry, and receiving a negative reply, Amoross said she ordered him to fetch Miss Grimaldenne's cloak and hood from the ante-room. Buttons was some time over his errand. This aforesaid hood—Tom being the cardinal term of reference—was a matter of unfailing delight, and he was busily engaged in trying its effect on himself.

"Ah," said Tom, looking at himself apologetically in the glass, "I couldn't look so bugy as her, not if I tried all ways. But oh my, though, I'm sure she scratch me, if she catch me with the little lega? Well, all I can say is, if she catches him, I'll treat myself to three dozen oysters on the strength of it. But she just give him a time of it, lawks-a-daisy me!"

And Tom relieved himself of some of his superfluous energy by turning a somersault, and then retraced his steps to the drawing-room, and demurely helped Amoross to don the objectionable hood.

But Tom's joy was evidently not equalled by his ability. The headgear was so badly adjusted through his agency that Amoross's curls were dragged backward—and her bald head shone helplessly in the light of the lamp.

"Stupid!" exclaimed Amoross, turning on the boy with a decided double emphasis in her small green eyes.

"Yes, it's me that's the stoopid now," reflected Tom; "but it will be him pretty soon, if she catches him, for all the lovey-doveys he gets beforehand."

And Tom chuckled maliciously. Amoross saw the chuckle, and gave a vicious look at the boy.

"You did it on purpose," she said.

"Oh, mum!" exclaimed Tom, with the air of a traduced saint.

Amoross did not condescend to dispute the question; but, as she bade Mrs. St. George good-night, and met the clear, mischievous gleam of the keen dark eye, Amoross whispered angrily:

"That's a very dangerous lad. I should part with him at once if I were you. There is nothing what he might do."

"I am not afraid of him," answered Mrs. George, significantly.

And Amoross, having no foundation for retort, was fain to depart without having afforded herself any relief.

Balnwick was usually considered a quiet place, but was now and then visited by some sufficiently lawless characters, from gay sailors just come on land, ready primed for any lark that should present itself, with plenty of ready money in their pockets, to wild Irish from Limerick at night, frightening unprotected spinsters, and setting a limited police staff at defiance, in the most audacious way. It must be owned that a watchful mother's quiet tea-table, varied by a card-party, was poor entertainment for reckless lads, who had had months of confinement with ship or regiment, and now considered themselves bound to put their bygone projects into execution with the least possible delay. As it happened, a young lieutenant in the navy, a son of Mrs. Sturt's, had been giving a wine-party to a few favorite chums at the George Hotel, and, when all had drunk enough to render them little elevated, a proposition was made that they should sally forth and stop all the chairs homeward bound from the different parties.

"I tell you what, Sturt," said Sturt, who, by reason of his superior years and position, was, of course, the ringleader, "I know the three Bardinge are somewhere in the town to-night."

"And if we catch 'em!" suggested a small midshipman, his blue eyes on fire with fun and glee.

"Why, then we'll bid them an affectionate goodnight. We're all brothers and sisters, aren't we? Was Adam our general father, or was he not? If he was telling a lie, I'll give you leave to correct me. I've no false pride of that sort."

"But he was,"

"And Eve, what was she?"

"Our general mother."

"Of course. Then what is more disgraceful and improper than to see relatives on bad terms? I ask you that. You haven't answer unless you like; but, if you do, let it be in a straightforward way, one becoming your rank as a midshipman in her Majesty's service."

"Family dissensions are vulgar and demoralising. You hurt his feelings there, Winstanley, upon my honor. Tben, with our noted respect for the ladies, we should not feel justified in allowing them to do anything vulgar and demoralising."

"Certainly not."

"Ergo, let us have very vulgar to quarrel, it must be the height of refinement to embrace."

"Bravo!" shouted his five listeners in chorus.

"Don't splash me, I beg. I am merely adding my help in stating these simple facts," said Lieutenan Sturt, who was delighted to find that he could reason so clearly and logically after a champagne dinner. "Hurrah, and bisbum. Now, this question satisfactorily settled, what is to prevent our intercepting the three Darlings, and refunding their money if they make a fuss of our vow? If other adventures should present themselves meanwhile, we shall know how to profit by them. Now, then, all ready, and the word of command is, 'England expects every man to do his duty.'"

The little band sallied out with these words, and posted themselves in a dark alley leading into the principal street, where they saw two chairs coming slowly from the opposite direction.

"Only two!" said Lieutenant Sturt, in a disappointed tone. "Well, I'll be a man inside, I am positive. It is no use there."

These were allowed to pass unmolested, but in another moment they returned in sight.

"I'll bet you a pound it was the Darlings after all," exclaimed the brisk midshipman, impetuously.

"Hold your tongue, Winstanley," replied Lieutenant Sturt, with some severity; "you'll spoil all the fun if you chatter so confoundedly. Now, boys, you are the last one, but mind that I, as commander, have the first right of search, and shall board the craft at once if I find any contraband goods."

The five young men bore rapidly down upon the tiny vehicle wherein Amoross, wrapped in her cozy hood, was complacently reviewing the events of the evening. Her bearers were not valiant by nature, and soon yielded to necessity and coercion. Announcing their capture of the lady, they had set down the chair close to the pavement, under a lamp, and drew aside, rather enjoying the adventure themselves. Amoross soon perceived how matters were going, and uttered a shrill scream.

"Oh, gentlemen, pray do have mercy!" she pleaded. "I assure you I am a person of irreproachable character, and indeed, and I have never been stopped in the street in such a shameful way before. I beseech you to regard me in the light of a sister only."

"A grandmother, you mean," exclaimed the young bucaneers, as he caught a good view of her face. "Grandmother, we won't hurt you. Shut her up," he added, turning to the bearers, who were grinning widely in the background.

Amoross still continued to moan and plead piteously.

"There, go home to bye-bye, grandmama," said Winstanley, with mischievous glee; "we are sad rascals, I dare say, but we always respect old age. Do shut her up, you men there."

This time the bearers hastily complied, because Winstanley was considerate enough to back his persuasions by a gift of money, and Amoross was carried on her way homeward once again. On reaching her own house she entered the drawing-room precipitately, threw herself on the nearest couch, and went into violent hysterics.

"Amoross, what can be the matter? I never saw you indulge in such an indecorous display of feeling before," said Miss Grimaldenne, who, having arrived first, was impatiently awaiting Amoross's return.

"Such a ghastly outrage!" exclaimed Amoross, laughing and sobbing at the same time. "They —stopped—me—and they wanted—to—to—kiss me!"

"And did they—do it?" inquired Miss Grimaldenne, her chaste lips refusing to close on the wicked verb.

"No," and Amoross sobbed more violently than before.

"Then be grateful for your deliverance," said Miss Grimaldenne, with dignity. "What possible cause for grief can you have when you have so mercifully escaped the snare laid for your undersigning feet?"

"That's just it," replied Amoross, who was too agitated to be insincere. "I'd rather they had done it than shut me up in that humiliating way and call me grandmother."

"Amoross!" said Miss Grimaldenne, with crushing severity, "I am literally horrified and astonished at your miserable depravity. For the future I shall hold as little intercourse with you as possible, in case your evil example and communications should corrupt my morals. I will try to forgive you, Amoross, but from this moment you have fallen irredeemably in my esteem, and at my death I shall leave you under Kezzie's guardianship, in order to prevent the possibility of your bringing any disgrace upon our family and name."

And with these words, loftily intoned, Miss Grimaldenne left the room with stately and severe grace

CHAPTER XIV.—THE TANGLED WEB OF DECEPTION.

THE good understanding recently concluded between Nina and Captain Marsh seemed to have small chance of any lengthy duration. She had grown captious and irritable again, and was constantly stinging him, either with the sharpness of her retorts or her needless exercise of power. Cyril's patience was growing threadbare, especially as he could see no reason for this change, unless it were the near prospect of Nina and his Merryn's visit to Beechwood. Captain Marsh could not understand what there was in this fact to occasion the difference in Nina's manner to all about her. He was launched on the sea of doubts and perplexities once more, and this time he was given no chance of appeal, for Nina had told him decidedly from the first that whatever change he might remark in her he was not to speak of, for she would neither listen nor pretend to understand anything that he might have to say. This was a time when she must stand alone, and the less he came in her way the better should she be able to bear her trial.

As the day for the arrival of the visitors approached, Nina grew more and more restless and irritable. Gabrielle de Pene, who was often with her about this time, noticed the alteration in her friend, and spoke of it to Captain Marsh. He happened to be in the hall one day when she entered, after her afternoon before Mr. and Miss Mervyn were expected. Gabrielle wore a jaunty little hat, in which the wing of some brilliant bird, name unknown, waved backward and forward as she walked. Her dress was looped up all round, showing the edge of a crimson petticoat, and a couple of the prettiest little feet in the world. The frosty air had brought a flush to her clear cheek, and her great dark eyes glowed with a species of laughing mirth like a mischievous fay.

Gabrielle was looking quite her best, and was pleasantly conscious of the fact. But Captain Marsh gave no sign of having made the same discovery. He was standing moodily at the stove, pretending to warm himself, and there was no welcome beyond a grave inclination of the head as Gabrielle came up to his side.

"Oh! I am so glad to find you here, Captain Marsh," said Gabrielle, quickly. "Can you tell me what has come over Nina lately?"

The shadow deepened on Cyril's face, and he did not at once attempt any reply. When he at last spoke it was in a tone of suppressed impatience.

"You must ask Nina herself, mademoiselle. I can hardly be expected to know all her secrets."

"Not all, but some, perhaps?" and Gabrielle's manner was significant, and the slightest degree scornful.

"I suppose you imagine that in my character of patriarch I should be likely to receive the confidence of young ladies. I have no relish for the soft confidences and mockery, unless—and he turned upon her with a sudden gleam of mischief in his eye—"you will allow me to survive you, Mademoiselle de Pene."

Gabrielle gave a quick start.

"Did you burn your hand?" inquired Cyril with apparent anxiety.

She scanned her foot impatiently.

"You are both incomprehensible and disagreeable," Captain Marsh. I rather liked you at one time, but I have had reason since to revoke my favorable opinion. But I tell you what, if you think—"

"I don't think anything wrong," replied Cyril with a smile, "but allow myself to feel a little grandfatherly anxiety on your account."

"And pray why?" said Gabrielle sharply, and the smouldering glow in her eyes shot out into a broad flame.

Cyril answered her very gently, avoiding her eye that he might not witness any emotion his words created.

If I were your brother, there is one question I should feel it my duty to put to you before I closed my eyes this night."

"Put yourself in the place of my brother for five minutes," replied Gabrielle in a tone of unrepressed scorn.

"Put yourself in the place of my brother for a few minutes," replied Gabrielle in a tone of unrepressed scorn.

"You will not think me impertinent?"

"You speak as a brother."

"Indeed I do, mademoiselle. Is there no partiality you have experienced lately which is neither safe nor justifiable? I can only give this warning; but I know you are too intelligent to need an explanation at the same time."

"What partiality?" murmured Gabrielle in a tone of suppressed emotion. "I do not understand you."

"Colonel St. George," answered Cyril, speaking more gently still, but keeping his eyes persistently fixed on the stove.

"Colonel St. George!" repeated Gabrielle, with a sigh of relief, and a quick return of her old gaiety. "Most gray and reverend signior, I am happy to be able to inform you that Colonel St. George has not once been in my thoughts since he left this house three weeks ago. He might have been a very dangerous person indeed; I have no doubt he was if you say so; but I cannot speak from experience myself. My gentle peace of mind is not so easily disturbed as you'd imagine. It is not quite enough for a man to look at me, touch me, offer me, or ask me to dance, for me to find my feelings hopelessly involved. You town and travelled men think all the country people are fools, but you are quite mistaken. We are not so fashionable as you are, perhaps, but we are quite as sharp."

At this moment Nina was heard calling from the stairs:

"Gabrielle, is that you?"

"Yes, it is. Won't you come down?"

"You are going to stay all day, of course?"

"No, indeed, I am not. Mama is poorly with a tire-some migraine, and I couldn't leave her for long. I only came to see if you felt inclined for a walk. The day is so bright and nice, I am sure you would enjoy it."

"Very well; go in and speak to mama whilst I am dressing. I shall soon be ready. Ask Captain Marsh if he won't accompany us."

"Can't you ask him yourself?" said Cyril.

"Tell me, sir, if an answer you mean to give me first; you know I don't like to be refused."

"I should think you had had no sort of experience in that way."

"Well, Captain Marsh, are you coming with us?"

"Certainly, Miss Marsh, now that you do me the honor of making the inquiry."

Cyril's tone and manner were light enough, but his eyes were more earnest than they had ever come for being. He felt as lightly as he spoke. Nina answered more cheerfully than usual with her of late:

"Very well: I shan't be a moment."

And Gabrielle nodded, and walked off towards the drawing-room. In a few minutes Cyril came in to find her.

"Nina is waiting for us if you are ready," said he; and Gabrielle kissed Mrs. Marsh, and followed him out.

Gabrielle had truly said that the day was "bright and nice." The road was crusted with a thick and sparkling frost; the bare trees hung heavy with snow; but the air was fresh and warm and pleasant, the air invigorating. It was what the French call "un beau froid." No leaden atmosphere and universal grayness, as if all the earth were dressed in dingy half-mourning, but a pale yellow brilliancy, cheering, and not unduly chilly.

Nina walked silently along for a time, leaving Gabrielle and Captain Marsh all the conversation to themselves. Presently they strolled into the lanes, and, as they had a sharp corgi with them, brought almost face to face with Anna and Jack Dawes. The two were surrounded with dogs of divers breeds. A Newfoundland puppy, kept guard at Anna's side, a pugnacious little terrier, perched at his heels, and bidding him defiance with all the audacity in the world. Two beagles, chained together two by two, ambled along at a safe distance from the mistress's skirts. A splendid setter capered round Jack, licking his hand, and demonstrating his affection in every way in his power; while a pet poodle, of apoplectic stoutness and indolent magnanimity, brought up the rear.

The fine healthy color on Jack's cheeks turned to a deep red glow as he held out his hand to Nina. Anna's greeting was not quite so conspicuous. She did not like Nina, although she could hardly have explained why. It was not exactly jealousy, to do Anna justice, but for some reason or other she suspected Nina, and could not feel sure of her sincerity. Being perfectly frank and straightforward herself, she noticed the opposite qualities in Nina the more readily, and resented Jack's preference on account of its object rather than for the preference itself. It must always have been a struggle with Anna Dawes when Jack turned the first thought of his heart away from her, for she has learned to consider his love and care exclusive privileges of her own; but, had she woman she loved been all she considered worthy of him, she would have resigned her position with less difficulty.

There is some instinct which guides a woman straight to the enemy's camp. Nina knew that, although good and kind to her, Anna regarded her with coldness and distrust, and looked upon Jack's partiality as a most unsociable infatuation. At one time, knowing all this, would have believed it impossible that she should ask, or even accept, any obligation at Miss Dawes's hand; but the unfortunate circumstances which had already forced upon her so many serious humiliations gave her more bitter drawbacks to swallow yet. She could only see one clear path amongst her wretched entanglements, and that must be followed at any sacrifice of pride.

She stooped down presently to caress the fat poodle, and the others went on all but Jack, to whom these precious moments at Nina's side were worth handfuls of gold.

"Poor Snip is getting short-winded," she said, with that indescribably sweet smile of hers, which made a commonplace remark from her lips sound wise and witty in Jack's ear.

"Well, now, you see, Miss Nina," answered Jack, showing a double row of large white teeth in his satisfaction, "I've had him from a pup, and his sire was hrod on our place, so I've a sort of feeling that I shouldn't like to have him shot, although he is shoon worn out."

"How is it you make all your animals obey you so well?" asked Nina, presently.

"Well, it's by love, I s'pose, Miss Nina, for I never so much as used a whip to any of 'em in my life. But they know I mean what I say, and they're fond of me, you see, and there's a good deal in that with dumb beasts."

"I suppose there is. But haven't you a fine young colt? I heard papa speaking of it the other day."

"It's a beauty, Miss Nina, it really is! I should like you to see it. We aren't very far from the stables, if you wouldn't mind just stepping round."

"No; I was going to ask you to have me a little while at Gladchiles, only Miss Dawes, I see, disapproves of it, and that she would not be induced to tolerate my society."

Jack turned quite white with pleasure.

"You mean coming to stay, don't you?" he breathlessly inquired.

"Yes, I did mean that, only I fear Miss Dawes would not relish the idea so much as I do."

Jack hesitated. As the pleasure of it dashed with pain. His sister's manner, always when Nina was under discussion, had given him a vague feeling of uneasiness, and any silence when Nina was praised had appeared to Jack, although he was not penetrating, as very suggestive. At any rate, he had formed no definite opinions of a dim impression that Nina was no favorite of Anna's, and to hear it verified by other lips was quite sufficient to bring conviction to Jack's mind. He felt angry with his sister for the first time in his life. What if her prejudices should stand in the way of Nina's visit?

"Then, by heaven! she shall suffer for it," said Jack to himself; and Anna, could she have divined his thought, would have seen the imprudence of standing between such a woman and love. There was a fierce gleam in Jack's eyes as he turned round to Nina again.

"I'm unsteady no more," he said sternly. "Those I like I have, and those I don't like stop away."

"Still, I shouldn't wish to do anything disagreeable to Miss Dawes; besides, the invitation must come from her."

"Must it?"

"Of course, she is the lady of the house."

"Oh, dear, oh, dear! exclaimed Jack, with the frankest dismay, "I don't understand how to get round women, and that's a fact. Now, if it was a horse, Miss Nina, I could do it by gently using as I liked. But there's something very puzzling about women. You can tell exactly what they will and what they won't like, and if once they get the bit in their mouths they'll run for it by the devil's way in no time—begging your pardon, Miss Nina. Now, Nina, you see, is uncommon pleasant as long as she gets all her own way; but it's little as she she'll turn restive when she comes to feel the reins. Nan's only half broke, but I'll bring her to her bearings, never you fear."

"You see, Mr. Dawes," said Nina, speaking in a confidential tone which nearly sent Jack mad with delight, "we have had some very disagreeable people coming to Beechwood, and I should be glad to get out of the way if I could."

"Are they going to stay long?" inquired Jack, eagerly.

"I don't know; but I should think it wouldn't be over a week in any way."

"I should like them to stop there for ever!" said Jack.

"I am afraid you would get very tired of me if they did," answered Nina, with her sweetest smile.

"I wish I was a parson," said Jack, presently, with a helpless look at Nina, and then he stopped short, amazed at his own audacity.

"A parson?" repeated Nina, very much inclined to laugh at the idea of Jack with his tastes and habits, inclining to the ecclesiastical. "And why?"

"Because they can talk so well. Just listen to them! They've only got two or three lines to make a show of, and they can palaver about it for an hour in such a way, with my heart as full as it would burst, and if you'll forgive me, Miss Nina, I couldn't tell you anything about what was in it."

"Shall you mount'n try, Jack—do you hear?" said Nina, suddenly assuming the tone and passing the group who had gone before.

I didn't understand what she said at the last about 'worthy,' and you'll forgive Jack, as he slowly followed her steps; "that she called me Jack, and that I do understand. I'd draw the last breath and bleed with the best of them, Miss Nina, to do it. There isn't another woman like her in all the world. God bless her!"

And Jack pictured Nina once brightened by that sweet presence. He thought of himself coming home weary from his long ride, and, finding this gentle creature waiting for him on the threshold of his house, welcoming him with outstretched arms and smiling lips, and Jack thrilled with a deep, passionate thrill which shook him from head to foot. His heart seemed to be bursting with the fullness of its great throbs of passion. He could have worshipped Nina literally to the last day of life, and he believed in her with a simplicity of faith had been an angel instead of a woman. And he dreamt on, poor Jack, in the midst of her voice the soft accompaniment of his reveries. Every now and then he caught the white gleam of her own profile as she half turned to answer some question addressed to her, and once she even spoke to him, and Jack's sweet dream gathered strength with her smile.

He was sorry enough when they reached his own gate, and Anna stood in the garden. He could not stay behind and leave his sister to go in alone, but he consoled himself with a long, lingering pressure of Nina's hand. Nina's face glowed, and a pained expression crept into her eyes, but she suddenly withdrew her hand and walked on with a sober face. In another quarter of an hour Gabrielle de Pêne had also left them, and Nina and Captain Marsh were the rest of the way alone.

We do not know what persuasions or threats Jack used for the attainment of his purpose, but certain it is that, towards nightfall the same day, a most gracious and pressing invitation for Nina to spend a week at Gladchiles came from Miss Dawes. Better in hand, Nina went up to her mother's dressing-room.

"Mama," she said, "I have just had a little note from Anna Dawes, asking me to go there for a few days."

"And you have declined, of course?"

"I haven't answered yet; but I thought of accepting."

"But, my dear Nina, how could you possibly be absent during Miss Mervyn's visit?"

"Why, mamma? I am neither the mistress of the house nor the eldest daughter."

"Still you are Miss Mervyn's especial attraction at Beechwood—it is useless to deny that; and, after her kindness to you last autumn, I do not see how, in common politeness, you could quit home during her stay."

"No, perhaps not; but before she came I might."

"At any rate, I should be seriously annoyed if you were to do so, Miss Mervyn is a very old friend of mine; she has always shown great affection for you besides, and I should not like her to be neglected and slighted by any member of the family."

Mrs. Marsh spoke quite decidedly for her, but Nina had not taken their most obstinate fold. It was evident that she had no intention of giving in. She answered, coldly and firmly:

"You see, mama, if people are bound down by all this sort of ponsideration there is no freedom of action at all, and it would be as well to turn Beechwood into a nunnery with the smallest possible delay. Miss Mervyn is very estimable, and so on, that I am quite willing to allow; but, just now, I really don't feel equal to entertaining visitors."

"Then you cannot be equal to making visits," said Mrs. Marsh, quietly.

"Well, then, mama, if I must speak plainly, I don't mean to meet Mr. and Miss Mervyn. If you object to my going away, I will take to my room and keep it locked on all intruders, leaving you to make what excuses you like; but as to being at Miss Mervyn's company one hour, or even one minute, I will not. There is a certain point beyond which a person is not justified in escaping a child. I would do a great deal out of pure love for you, mama, but I must be allowed to consider my own feelings and dignity at times. To force me into a most distasteful encounter would not increase my affection, and it is a trial you cannot care for me to make. I am not to be led. I speak plainly, mama, because in this matter it is more necessary than you imagine that I should have my own way."

"What could have been the use of consulting me if you were so determined beforehand?"

"I merely wish to mention the thing to you as my mother."

A slight pang, that would have been a long agony with some women more sensitive than Mrs. Marsh, passed through her heart as she answered her daughter:

"It seems to me that I have borne only the title for some time past. It is easy to see how much you have become estranged from all of us of late. You never cared at one time to go your own way without reference to my wishes and feelings. You were loving to me, and patient of your father's and brother's temper. It is all altered. There is something the matter with you that I can't understand, but you know best, of course, whether you are to go or stay on this occasion."

Nina sank impetuously on her knees, and buried her head in her mother's lap.

"Mamma, don't question me, only love me! I am so utterly miserable! For over a year now I have not known what it is to have a single happy hour. If you knew of Jack, with his love, better die at once! What is the use of my living? I am no comfort to any one. I hate and despise myself so much myself that sometimes as if I could tear myself to pieces. Oh, mamma! pity me—love me! I am so utterly wretched!"

"Nina, my poor child, what does this mean?" inquired Mrs. Marsh in a tone as perplexed as compassionate.

"Nina, my poor child, what does this mean?" inquired Mrs. Marsh in a tone as perplexed as compassionate.

"Oh, I'll tell you, if you ask me—I'll tell you everything! I can't bear this concealment! It seems as if this miserable secret were eating into my very heart!"

"Have you done anything wrong, Nina?" said Mrs. Marsh, in a low, terrified whisper. "What is it? Can't you tell me?"

"Would you love me and the same, mama? If I have done what is wrong, you are my mother still; you gave me life, remember. If I am wilful, and headstrong, and passionate, it is my fault or yours? Some people say that the child is influenced by the thoughts and feelings of the mother! I am so miserable! so wicked!"

And she gave way to a paroxysm of passionate agony, and had her face again in Mrs. Marsh's dress.

Mrs. Marsh looked helplessly about her.

Her child was in the power of a secret which, as Captain Murray, 7th Iowa cavalry, and some Marshall county militia, with one cannon. The enemy, Sioux and Cheyennes, numbered from the 16th of August, 12 miles from Little Blue station, where the road from Fort Kearney to Fort Laramie crosses the river. The soldiers and militia fought four hours, but the Indians were larger mounted and armed, and finally drove them back 10 miles.

In the time of Sir John Macpherson's government, most of his staff consisted of Scotch gentlemen, whose names began with Mac. One of the aides-de-camp used to call the governor Jemmy Jones. "For," said he, "if you stand in the middle of the crowd and call Mac, you will have a dozen out of every window."

PROSPICE.

BY R. BROWNING.

Fear death? to feel the fog in my throat,
The mist in my face,
When the snows begin, and the blasts denote
I am nearing the place,
The power of night, the press of the storm,
The post of the foe:
Where he stands, the Arch-Fear, in a visible form,
Yet the strong man must go;
For the journey is done and the summit attained,
And the barriers fall,
Though a battle's to fight ere the guerdon be gained,
The reward of it all.
I was ever a fighter, so one fight more,
The best and the last!
I would hate that death bandaged my eyes, and forbore
And bade me creep past.
No! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers,
The heroes of old,
Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears
Of pain, darkness and cold.
For sudden the worse turns the best to the brave,
The black minutes attend,
And the element's rage, the fiend voices that rave,
Shall dwindle, shall blend,
Shall change, shall become first a peace, then a joy,
Then a light, then thy breast,
Oh! thou soul of my soul! I shall clasp thee again,
And with God be at rest.

ADMINISTERING THE OATH OF ALLEGIANCE

To Rebel Prisoners.

Among the prisoners who fall into our hands many take the oath of allegiance and enter the service. Some are deterred from doing this by the ridicule of their more violent comrades, who look for any act being put in the front and falling into the hands of the rebels, who would shoot them as deserters. To obviate this poor regulations have been made. Those men are used as far as possible to fight from the States to have been sent to the northwest, some to garrisons, some for employed in scouting. The return of our Gettysburg rains directing are sent in all parts of the Union. Such measures, and such other effect that not a deserter comes in without one in his pocket.

EXPLOSION OF THE B. B. SANDERS.

Steamboat racing has of late years fallen into disuse, such fearful ending with the lives of hundreds having been lost in the unanimous and public denunciations of the whole community. Our rivers and lakes, of late, have been comparatively free from the accidents resulting from racing, but on Sunday morning of Sept. 16, two tugboats, the B. B. Sanders and Olive Belle, had a race from the lower dock of the Erie railway, opposite the foot of Jackson street, New York, the former boat captained by her father and everything in her being thrown high into the air. Of the seven men on board four were drowned, viz.: Capt. Sanders, Jr., Forpet Wilsey, having been carried 50 feet through the air.

Practically all the boiler, machinery and woodwork were thrown several hundred feet, many falling on the Erie docks. One piece, weighing 400 pounds, was hurled to Jackson's marble yard near the foot of Jackson street. Several pieces, also, were thrown across the river, some by fragments, and a pelice officer was seriously hurt.

The B. B. Sanders was built in Brooklyn, E. D., in 1862, and was built in Troy, in 1863, at a cost of $40,000.

THE INDIAN WAR.

The battle with the Indians which appeared in our last was a severe one, it appears from later details, by Capt. Murphy. The Iowa cavalry, and some Marshall co. militia, with one cannon. The enemy, Sioux and Cheyennes, numbered from the 16th of August, 12 miles from Little Blue station, where the road from Fort Kiley to Fort Kearney crosses the river. The soldiers and militia fought four hours, but the Indians were larger mounted and armed, and finally drove them back 10 miles.

THE GREAT GERMAN FESTIVAL, THE "TURNFEST" AT JONES'S WOOD, NEW YORK—SCHAUTURNEN, (SHOW-TURNING) MONDAY AFTERNOON, SEPT. 12.—From a Sketch by A. Berghaus.

THE SIEGE OF PETERSBURG—VIEW OF GRANT'S POSITION ON THE WELDON RAILROAD, FROM THE CENTRE OF THE LINE LOOKING LEFT FROM A SKETCH BY ANDREW McCALLUM.

THE WAR IN THE SHENANDOAH VALLEY—MARTINSBURG, VA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, J. E. TAYLOR.

OCCUPATION OF MARTINSBURG, VIRGINIA.

GEN. AVERILL, on the 19th Sept., reoccupied Martinsburg, and the restoration of the Baltimore and Ohio road was at once begun.

Martinsburg, of which a sketch will be found on another page, is the capital of Berkeley county, Va. It is situated on a fertile elevated region on Tuscarora creek, a few miles west of the Blue Ridge, and was in other days a busy, active place, its water-power and railroad facilities giving its manufactures—especially of flour and iron—a great impulse. It has been racked, impoverished and paralyzed by the war, but has in its very position the certainty of future growth.

GRANT'S OPERATIONS.

Grant's Railroad.

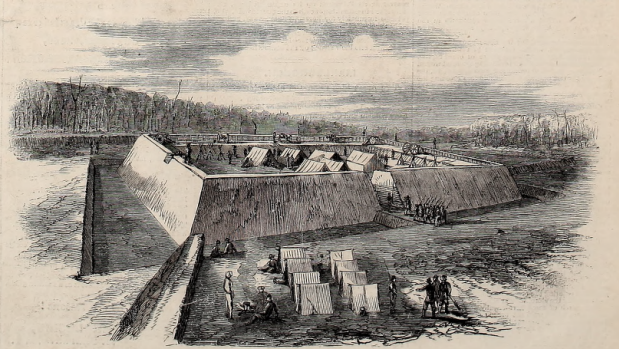
"THE railroad in war" is a new and curious chapter furnished by our civil strife. The great struggle is for railroad lines, and once possessed to adapt them to use. Gen. Grant, in sitting down before Petersburg, availed himself of the City Point and Petersburg railroad, already existing, and has just added a new road to it, so that cars can run from City Point to his extreme left on the Weldon road, which it will doubtless soon cross.

This extension, nine miles in length, shows the wonderful resources of our army.

Without any preliminary preparation, without surveys to establish the line or the grades, Major Wentz, the Superintendent of Military Railroads, employing detachments from the different corps, completed the whole work in 11 days. Several ravines were to be crossed, but these were bridged by substantial works. Our Artist sends us a series of sketches of this remarkable road. We have first, in order of time, a party o

THE TURNFEST.

THE Turn Verein has been for some years endeavoring to teach us some good lessons in physical education, and we must say that we do not see that our American youth have benefited by the instruction imparted. All agree on the great neglect of physical training in this country; and the use of gymnasia, either in connection with or independent of seminaries of education, has progressed steadily, while valuable treatises on physical training have been prepared to guide less experienced teachers. Still all this is little. To give it a zest, association on the Turner plan is needed.



The great Turnfest this year took place at Jones's Wood, beginning on Sunday, Sept. 11, and ending on Thursday, Sept. 15. The Turn Halle, in Orchard street, formerly a meeting-house of the Society of Friends, were a strange look indeed, compared to its antecedents. The room was splendidly decorated with banners, and crowded with delegates from the Turner associations of Boston, Rochester, Springfield, New Haven, Hartford, Bridgeport, Providence, Albany, Poughkeepsie, Newark, Trenton, St. Louis, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Memphis, Cincinnati and Chicago, as well as of those immediately in and around New York.

The Turners and their guests proceeded on Monday to Jones's Wood at an early hour, where the day was passed in prize exercises and Turner gymnastics, fencing, wrestling and racing.

The weather was unfavorable during the week, detracting from the usual success, diminishing the exercises and driving off less hardy spectators.

Our Artist illustrates the Free Show Turning on Monday afternoon, in which apparently a grand piece of human pyrotechnics is going on. It gives, perhaps, better than any other scene, an idea of the strength, agility and skill developed by the Turner training.

Besides the exercises at the Wood, the Turners had concerts, theatrical exhibitions, &c., &c., at the Stadt Theatre.

GRANT'S POSITION ON THE WELDON RAILROAD—FORT HANCOCK—SECOND CORPS ON THE RIGHT OF THE NEW LINE.—SKETCHED BY ANDREW McCALLUM.

soldiers laying the ties; next, another laying the rails.

The other views illustrate the work completed, giving some of the most interesting points. Thus we see it passing the Jones House; also where it passes the Gurley House, near the Southern bridge; and the splendid trestle-work put up to cross a ravine near the Gurley House. It is 820 feet long and 20 feet high; formed of a cribwork of rough logs, with heavy timbers run from across, on which the crossties were put down, and the rails bolted down.

The crossing of Jerusalem plankroad is another point of interest, best shown all the turnings at the Weldon railroad, and the view looking down that now famous tramway.

City Point.

Our fine large view shows well all its importance City Point, the base of supplies of Grant's great army. This place was formerly the point where exchanges of prisoners took place, and its sudden capture by Gen. Butler prevented any rebel instructions to the guard which Grant has promptly extended.

When Lieut.-Gen. Grant transferred the war to the south of the James he made City Point his depot of supplies, and it at once assumed a look of busy activity.

Grant's Position.

Another sketch, which our readers will study with interest, is the view from the camp on the extreme left line, on the Weldon railroad, looking to the left. In the foreground may be seen the rear guard of the 10th New York battery, with a well-planted abattis in front. Our picket lines are now in the woods on the right, from which runs out the line of the Weldon road. From this extend to the left those of the right the lines of the 9th and 5th corps (Warren's), with occasional redoubts. Near the Weldon road will be noticed a fort, which we illustrated recently.

The house on the extreme left is the Blick House already mentioned in describing the new railroad, which runs behind Dep'ew's line.

The cavalry-magazine in the battery, with the case shot in front "saving," need no description.

Fort Hascall.

On the right of our new line the 2d corps have thrown up Fort Hascall, which will at once be seen to be a proof of the labor of our men and the strength of their position.

Rebel Forts.

We also give a view of rebel forts on the second line of works, thrown up to defend Petersburg. From Fort Wilcox our Artist could see the men busy repairing the works and mounting new guns. The fort on the right hand side is armored with a heavy rifled gun. It was on this line that our men roused in vain on the 30th ult.

Building a Corduroy Road.

We conclude this week's sketches of Grant's army, south of the James, by a pendant to the first of them: A party of soldiers, engaged under one of those ingenious wheels practical experience has made perfect calculating how to build a road over the marsh. It is a very pleasant thing to travel, rather preferable to having Rebs thrown stab to the box in the Headmaster Virginian mire.

Perilous Adventures with Snakes.

A RESIDENT in India, Siam and Burmah has very much the same influence upon outdoor life as a residence in London, in at least one respect—it makes you wary of your life. In London you pause and take every precaution to avoid the possibility, amidst the immense throng of vehicles, of coming to any exhaustive end; and by those precautions duly exercised may, with God's blessing, avoid the daily catastrophes recorded in the papers. So also in India, the quantity and deadly venomous quality of snakes of all sizes and shapes, from the cobra de capello to the tiny but equally deadly carpet-snake, puts a pegs upon their guard against the intrusion of such foes by such reasons as are never dreamt of by people in Europe. Such, for instance, as carefully examining every portion of your bed and bedroom, of violently shaking boots and clothes before wearing them, and which is an operation not unfrequently rewarded by the rental of a scorpion, or a snake, or maybe a comfortably coiled up cobra under your pillow.

One of the first Tamul words which becomes familiar to European infants and adults alike is the word "paumbu," or the snake. A native passenger on a entrance of a baby in arms, who could just manage to prattle, being instrumental in all probability in saving the life of the child, or of the nurse. The woman, as is the custom, had laid herself down upon a mattress on the floor, and no sooner she could the nurse see that the child to sleep with a foot or an arm without disturbing herself from her recumbent position—nay, almost without observably exhausting from that heavy lethargy which falls upon this class of people after a plentiful supper of curry and rice. Apparently the child had been lying there for some little time, gazing perhaps as infants often as at the bright flame of the wreck of the occasional lamp, when of a sudden it uttered piercing screams, which thoroughly aroused not only the nurse, but the mother and father, and all the paluquin-bearers that usually make up the travellers.

Running to see what was the matter, the child distinctly uttered the word "paumbu," pointing at the same time to the hurriedly displaced bed-covering which the snake had removed on the approach of the nurse. Rising into up the hearers, who were armed with stout bamboos, killed a large snake coiled up in the bed-fold, to which they very speedily administered a quietus.

It is no uncommon thing for these poor barefooted paluquin-bearers, while carrying you through the jungle, to set foot upon some snake or other reptile, which usually ensues in inflicting a mortal wound upon them. And if, as on a clear moonlight night, the bearers step over these their deadly foes crossing the high road, they will very unceremoniously drop the palanquin at the earliest opportunity, and, leaving the unhappy inside passenger, assail the snake, leaving you to keep off the intruders as best you can, until they have dispatched the calamon foe, and can return to give battle.

Perhaps one of the most perilous encounters that I ever had with a snake occurred to me in a little up-country civil station called Chittoor, in the Arcot district, Southern Hindostan. We had in cultivate or go down, as these stores and warehouses are called in India, where you kept our annual supply of European wines, beer, spirits, preserved fruits, jams, &c., which were generally transported to us from out of the way place or chittoor, and which we kept under the safe custody of large padlock, the key of which was always a tenant of our waistcoat pockets.

Notwithstanding the professed reflexive antagonism to strong drinks the European abominations, there were many of our servants (especially the coachman, an old half-caste) who had a decided weakness in various members of the family, and invariably got drunk on pay-day and every quarter-day until they procured, and locked up his poor old wife unmercifully, who had what the Irish call a "fondness" for the fiery of any description. It was a daily duty or one or the other of us to serve out to the head dubash, or butler, such requisites as were required for consumption.

One fine morning I had preceded the dubash, who was busy entering the cook's morning market account, into entering the store, walked across it to the further end in search of some hermetically sealed viands and vegetables, which were not procurable in the place at that season of the year for love or money. The place was lighted only by the entrance-door, through which, however, there entered a sufficient flood of brilliant daylight to answer all my purposes.

I had just laid my hand upon a tin case of green pets and was speculating upon the best means of opening it when a sudden scathing, squeaking and hissing, close behind me, attracted my notice; and turning abruptly round, I saw that a huge cobra and an angry rat had tumbled just by the door of entrance, and were engaged in deadly combat. The former had in all probability intruded upon the latter's nest of young once somewhere in the rafters of the roof, and with a hostile reception.

Not waiting up with all the sedity of fear upon a strong projecting shelf, for I durst not make a rush at the former under peril of my life, I became an unwilling spectator of this most unequal contest. The rat for some time, conscious of its own strength, stood its ground with, kept its pang round and round, like an agile gymnast, evading, nearly every opportunity, the crash in and bite the snake, which had worked itself into a most distressing heat. The snake had darted at the rat with its protruded forked tongue in a manner that was really fearful to witness, and which was a source of spectacle again in the sunlight with rage.

At last the rat, after having received a deadly wound upon the brave little animal, who, apparently conscious that escape was impossible, put up all its previous caution, and rushed boldly in upon its adversary, seizing the latter's tail, and left eye of the snake, and never letting go its hold, notwithstanding all the struggles hashing and writhing of the latter and its mouth more powerful opponent, till the convulsions of death forced the rat to quit its prey.

The cobra, who had received its death-wound, now, to my terror made its way direct to the shelf where I was standing, and was evidently making up one of the posts that supported it. I had nothing in the shape of a weapon in the way of a club or description. But there chanced to be on a shelf over my head, and within my reach, a pound of rice, grown somewhere in the interior of Bengal. I clambered up to the shelf, and seizing a heavy bag, which made up a ugly appearance had wriggled itself half way across the shelf, dropping the rice on the floor, and so completely crushed the snake. I was not long, you may be sure, before I returned to the storehouse, and with every article in it to be removed (displacing and killing in the progress a number of young cobras) to a more commodious warehouse, where such unwelcome replier could easily be observed, and as quickly dispatched.

Another occasion, when I was stationed at Tellicherry, on the Malabar coast, I had dangerous and peculiar adventure of the thing viewed by three cases of for eggs. We kept a great many turkeys, and in the cocoa-nut grove adjoining the house, which (the compound) covered nearly four square miles of garden and fine old trees, the turkeys had the habit, in a few directions, making their nests and depositing their eggs in all kind of out-of-the-way places. Sometimes, after a disappearance of a week, they would return to the poultry-yard, accompanied by a young retinue or two keys. One day I tracked one of these hens to a considerable distance, leaving hedges and trees, so as best to conceal myself, finally to the end into a bush, whence, after a short time, she returned with all the following satisfaction of a new-fledged mother. I waited till the bird had disappeared in the direction of the poultry-yard, and then scrambled into the bush, when, in a roughly-made nest, I saw what I conceived to be some eight or ten large cream-colored eggs. Stopping to possess myself of this treasure and transfer the eggs from the nest to the coat-pocket, I was startled by an ominous hissing close beside me. Leaping back with all conceivable rapidity, I saw a monstrous cobra capello standing upright to an arrow in the centre of the bush, and shaking its big head to and fro, precisely in the same deadly age as sure and as deadly as a poisoned shaft. To this day I cannot tell how my impulse at the moment. I never paused to see whether I was pursued or not, but instantly into the house reckoned for some twenty-three or three-and-twenty inches in the range. That snake was sagacious enough never to stop itself to the bush or and pursuing her prey unchanging to the gest. The contents of my double-barrelled gun fired into the bush made it be quieted, and then we discovered that every egg had been in a successful state of its contents as it could have been by practised bird-dancer or the fowls the luckless inside being nearly reproduction to the naked eye.

At this very same place I subsequently had a very unpleasant encounter with another cobra during their breeding season, at which time they are more than usually vindictive. Strolling out in the cool dusk of the evening, I perceived a new snake under an isolated bush; bush, and to make sure, ere forthwith beginning to fire, I gave it a blow with a stone to rouse it from its sleep and dart out straight at me. I had scarcely time to get out of the way before the snake shot past me, and before he could contrive to turn I fired a shot into the middle of his body, and his legs would carry me. The venomous brute followed me with unrelenting fury, and but for the fact that I succeeded in reaching the stable, whence to my rescue called forth some half-dozen grooms, armed with grasscutters, armed with stout bamboos, with which they soon dispatched the intruder.

One more snake adventure and I will bring this little narrative to a close. I was favored by a friend of mine, Colonel W——, of the Madras Horse Artillery, who was superintending duty in the interior to the seaside, accompanied by his wife, we were staying at Alleppi Island, and with the object in view of sending her back to England by the first opportunity that offered. They were dining at one of the old-fashioned, tumble-down travellers' bungalows, which have been employed once were erected, and were seated at opposite ends of the dining-table, when the head dubash down from the ceiling upon the centre of the table a vile cobra, who, nevertheless, finally, and to be expected, and threatened instantaneous death to the poor invalid, who, with extraordinary presence of mind, threw away, and fell off her chair. Seizing the dilemma the snake seemed to be at the enticing dangerous nature of the victim, the Colonel rushed to the corner for his sabre, and unsheathing it, with one blow struck off the brute's head.

MARLBOROUGH.

The great blot upon the character of that eminent soldier, John, Duke of Marlborough, greater than the favorites of King James, or the duplicity to King William and Queen Anne, was his greedy accessions in money matters. He was accused of having received presents from all sides, and the instances, in which he held the station of generalissimo, with vast emoluments, merely for the sake of the money he received. He was also charged with having, during his home, he wrote to the Queen on a page out of his orderly sergeant's pocket-book, and to his wife on the back of a brown bill—not that paper was scarce, but that he was saving. He was publicly accused, in the House of Lords, of peculation in the discharge of the money committed to his trust as commander-in-Chief, and a majority voted him his pensions had been unwarrantable and illegal. It was imputed to him by the Lords of the Council, that he to shelter, he came a great number of officers to be stocked on the pay-list, and received the pay of them, and put the full pockets by dispensing of their commissions." His answer was as follows: "In one campaign, when the Earl of Peterborough (also a great soldier), was absent by a London rook for the Duke of Marlborough, then very unpopular, he gained himself from such usage, with which he was threatened, by calling out:

"Gentlemen, I can convince you, by two reasons, that I am not the Duke: in the first place, I have only five guineas in my pocket; and in the second (throwing his purse to the crowd as he spoke), they are heartily at your service."

Contrasted with Marlborough's acquisitiveness how proudly stands out the pure integrity of Washington! I

AN IRISH PEER.

LORD M——, as we are informed by Mr. Dunn, had obtained his title during a vacant period, in gracious recognition of some dexterous trafic in parliamentary votes; and he was as unprincipled in pecuniary as in political transactions. When Lord Kerry's house in Stephen's Green was for sale, Mrs. Keating desired to become the possessor of a per attached to it, which she erroneously assumed belonged to Lord M——, and wrote upon him for a satisfactory purchase.

"I am not aware that I own a pew in St. Ann's," said Lord M——.

"Pardon me," replied Mrs. Keating, "I find your Lordship has one; and, if you have no objections, I am willing to buy it."

Thus appealed to, Lord M—— threw out no further obstacle. A bargain was struck; he took the money; and on the following Sunday, Mrs. Keating, on an imposing suit of crashing bombazine, sailed up the nave to the aforesaid pew, and, with all the bustle with much firmness, interposed, and, in reply to her expostulatory remonstrances, declared that it was "the new pew," and had never at any period belonged to Lord M.

The lady, taunting under the outlawed circumstances of the trick and the slight, retired with considerable loss of dignity, and with a flushed, and lost no time in writing on Lord M——, in the hope of obtaining some redress.

"My Lord," she began, "as regards the pew in St. Ann's,"

"Oh!" interrupted the poor, laughing, "you may have it for your own use on the same terms."

"Pray, don't add insult to injury, my Lord; you must be aware of your mistake, and that you really never held any pew in St. Ann's."

"Well, if you are to the first instance," replied Lord M——.

"Under all the circumstances," proceeded his fair visitor, "I trust your Lordship will kindly refund the money."

"Impossible, my dear madam; it's gone long ago."

"Pay your Lordship's character."

"That is also impossible," replied Lord M——, leaning back in his easy chair and laughing immoderately.

The money was never refunded, and Lord M—— subsequently obtained an unenviable notoriety for selling the commissions of a regiment of militia in which he was Colonel, and when upbraided with the act by the Lord-Lieutenant, simply replied.

"Your Excellency always told me to assimilate the militia as far as possible to the line. In the line commissions are sold."

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

The Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that subscriptions will be received for Compound Treasury Notes, payable three years from August 19th, 1864, with semi-annual interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum—principal and interest both to be paid in lawful money.

These notes will be convertible, at the option of the holder at maturity, into six per cent. gold bearing bonds, payable not less than five nor more than twenty years from their date, as the Government may elect. They will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1,000 and $5,000, and all subscriptions must be for fifty dollars, or some multiple of fifty dollars.

As the notes draw interest from August 15, persons making subscriptions subsequent to that date must pay the interest accrued from date of note to date of deposit.

Parties depositing twenty-five thousand dollars and upwards for these notes at any one time will be allowed a commission of one-quarter of one per cent.

Special Advantages of this Loan.

IT IS A NATIONAL SAVINGS BANK, offering a higher rate of interest than any other, and the best security. Any savings bank which pays its depositors in U. S. Notes considers that it is paying in the best circulating medium of the country, and it cannot pay in anything better, for its own assets are either in Government securities or in notes or bonds payable in Government paper.

Convertible into a Six per Cent. 5-20 Gold Bond.

In addition to the very liberal interest on the notes for three years, this privilege of conversion is now worth about three per cent. per annum, for the current rate for 5-20 Bonds is not less than nine per cent. per annum, and before the war the premium was ten per cent. U. S. stocks was over twenty per cent. It will be seen that the actual profit on this loan, at the present market rate, is not less than ten per cent. per annum.

Its Exemption from State or Municipal Taxation.

But aside from all the advantages we have enumerated, a special Act of Congress exempts all bonds and Treasury notes from local taxation. On the average, this exemption is worth one to two per cent. per annum, according to the rate of taxation in various parts of the country.

It is believed that no securities offer so great inducements to lenders as those issued by the Government. In all other forms of indebtedness, the faith or ability of private parties, or stock companies, or separate communities, only, is pledged for payment, while the whole property of the country is held to secure the discharge of all the obligations of the United States.

Subscriptions will be received by the Treasurer of the United States, at Washington, the several Assistant Treasurers and designated Depositaries, and by all National Banks which are depositories of public money, and throughout the country will give further information and

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called bitters are impure, and all the fiery compounding alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing cloud of fusel oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the roots, herbs, aromatics, and barks of several of our most valuable and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, has permanently stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its qualities are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Sheridan's Splendid Victories.

The War Goes Bravely On.

Gen. Sheridan's late brilliant success over the rebel Gen. Early, near Winchester, in the famous Shenandoah valley, was a blow for the Union which staggered alike the ruling rebel conspirators at Richmond and the gold gamblers of Wall street. They had still, however, the hope that Early, with the bulk of his army his artillery and provision trains, might possibly escape, until the news came sparkling over the wires of his second and more disastrous defeat at Fisher's hill, some 20 miles up the valley from Winchester, when, if we may judge from the effect upon the gold gamblers of New York, there must have been a sensation resulting in a general packing up of movables in the rebel capital.

We need not here repeat the details of these brilliant operations of Gen. Sheridan, nor the losses involved to the rebel army in men, artillery, small arms and all the materiel of war. Our present purpose will be answered in a few passing observations upon the value of these great victories in reference to the crowning object of all the combinations and movements of Gen. Grant's armies—the capture of Richmond. The army of Gen. Early, while it remained intact and defiant in the Shenandoah valley, served these purposes to Gen. Lee: It menaced the Maryland and Pennsylvania border and the rear of Washington; it detached from Gen. Grant's principal army a large force to watch the movements of Early; it held the Shenandoah valley and its supplies for the uses of Lee's forces around Richmond; it protected that city on the north side, and Lynchburg on the west, the most important depot of supplies now remaining to Lee; while in holding the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, Early materially interfered with the transportation of supplies and reinforcements to Gen. Grant from the West. Now, with the overthrow and dispersion of Early's veteran fighting and defiant "stonewall" corps, the line of the Union side recover the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, the absolute possession of the Shenandoah valley, all the gaps and passes in the Blue Ridge chain of mountains leading to the north side of Richmond, and an open way up the valley to Lexington, and across the mountains from that place to Lynchburg. The rear of Washington and the Maryland and Pennsylvania border are relieved, and Sheridan now, with 30,000 men or more, is free to move in any direction in carrying out the well-considered and sagacious combinations of Gen. Grant.

The alternative which is now presented to Gen. Lee is the sending out another army to take the place of that of Early in the Shenandoah valley; or a desperate effort to dislodge Gen. Grant from the Weldon Railroad; or one of the two measures for the evacuation of Richmond. Which of these alternatives is Lee most likely to adopt? He cannot replace the army of Early without so weakening his lines as to risk the fall of Petersburg and Richmond; he cannot venture upon an assault of the Union works on the Weldon road without hazarding the loss of his army in addition to the loss of Richmond; so that his only alternative of safety for his army is manifestly a timely evacuation. We still adhere to our original idea, that when driven to the wall, and in danger of a complete isolation from the means of supply, Lee will abandon Richmond to save his army; and we predict that he will retreat to Lynchburg, in order to maintain a footing upon the "sacred soil" of Virginia as long as possible; unless in the meantime he shall be compelled to move down into North Carolina, in view of a junction with the Georgia army of Hood.

At all events, Gen. Sheridan has so far simplified the work of the campaign as against Richmond, that no intelligent observer of the events of the war can doubt for a moment that the cause is now completely in the hands of Gen. Grant. Nor shall we be surprised if the crowning triumph of the war shall be the next bulletin of victory from Secretary Stanton.

We await in absolute confidence the further development of Gen. Grant's strategy and tactics. Meantime a passing glance at our military operations in the Shenandoah valley since the beginning of the year will show how great has been their influence heretofore in favor of the enemy at Richmond. In the summer of 1861, Gen. Patterson, with a column of 25,000 men, was assigned to the duty in the Shenandoah valley of giving employment to the rebel Joe Johnston and his 15,000 men, while Gen. McDowell moved upon Beauregard on the other side of the Blue Ridge at Manassas. But Johnston contrived to slip away from Patterson and the valley, and to join Beauregard in time to turn a Union victory into the disastrous defeat of the first Bull run. In March, 1862, a portion of the army of Gen. Banks, commanded by Gen. Shields, handsomely defeated Stonewall Jackson near Winchester, who was then pursued up the valley a hundred miles and more. Jackson, in May, strongly reinforced, Jackson retreated, and routing the forces of Gen. Banks from Strasburg, Front Royal and Winchester, pursued him in a running fight to the Potomac river. Shields, McDowell and Fremont, each with a strong force, were then advanced from different directions against Jackson. He was intercepted at Strasburg by Fremont, dislodged from Fisher's hill, driven by the valley to Cross Keys, near Port Republic, and defeated there in a fierce battle and driven out of the valley. Next, while our various army detachments were hunting him up, he was joined by Ewell, strongly reinforced, gave them again the slip, and with his massive column of 40,000 men dashed down upon the extreme right of Gen. McClellan on the Chickahominy, broke it up, and thus inaugurated those terrible and disastrous seven days' battles which ended in transferring the war from Richmond to Washington.

Again, in September 1862, while McClellan was moving against Gen. Lee's main army in Maryland, Stonewall Jackson, with his 20,000 men, pounced upon Gen. Miles and his 12,000 at Harper's Ferry, compelled him to a surrender of his whole force, including also 60 pieces of artillery and an immense amount of military stores. Thus was Lee's army in Maryland by these timely supplies saved from destruction. In 1863 the Stonewall corps, turned over to Ewell at Jackson's death, dashed over into the Shenandoah valley, and routing Milroy from Winchester, captured their ammunition, artillery and supplies of all kinds, without which Lee's defeat at Gettysburg would again have involved the destruction of his army. In 1864 the misfortunes of Sigel and Hunter in the Shenandoah valley early paralyzed the direct operations of Gen. Grant against Richmond, but brought down Gen. Early upon his late destructive raid into Pennsylvania and Maryland, and to the very gates of Washington.

To Gen. Sheridan, under Gen. Grant's admirable arrangements, belongs the honor of retrieving all these misfortunes, and of making his campaign in the Shenandoah valley as decisive against Richmond as all our preceding operations in that quarter had resulted to the security of Jeff Davis in his chosen capital. Now he is deserted, and the end draws nigh.

Diphtheria.

For the cure of that terrible disease, DAVIS'S PAIN KILLER is a specific, if resorted to in time.

It should be used, mixed with water, as a gargle, and the throat bathed with the Killer freely. Read what Dr. Walton writes us from Coshocton, Ohio:

"I am happy to inform you that the Pain Killer cures diphtheria. I have used it in one case, and that is prevailing to so alarming an extent in this section of the country. On Walnut Creek, Holmes county, they die scarcely any other disease, and cities never been known to fail in a single instance when used in time. This fact you may make known to the world."

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA—SHERIDAN'S ARMY.

On Sunday, Sept. 18th, the rebels under McCausland and Johnson, advanced from Bunker hill, and attacked Averill at Martinsburg. The fight lasted after a brief cessation, till back to Hainesville, a short distance from Falling Waters, on the Virginia side of the river, where he took a position.

During Sunday night Averill received reinforcements, and the next morning advanced against the rebels and drove them back to Bunker hill and reoccupied Martinsburg.

Gen. Sheridan attacked the army of Early on Monday morning, Sept. 19, at the Berryville gap crossing of Opequan creek, and the battle raged with great fierceness until five o'clock in the evening, when the rebels, after having kept up throughout the entire day the most stubborn resistance and fought with the greatest determination, were forced to give way, under complete defeat, which soon became a perfect rout, and they were driven through and beyond Winchester, only the darkness of night causing a cessation of the pursuit. The results of this magnificent victory of Sheridan's, as far as yet ascertained, are a loss to the rebels of five general officers and 2,000 men killed and wounded, officers and 2,000 men wounded, 5,000 prisoners, 15 battle flags and five pieces of artillery. The rebel generals killed were Rhodes, Gordon, Wharton, Ramseur and Godwin. Our losses are not yet fully ascertained, but are estimated at 2,000. We had Gen. Russell, commanding a division in the 6th corps, killed, and Gens. Upton, McIntosh and Chapman wounded. All of the enemy's dead and wounded fell into the hands of our army.

Sheridan did not stop to rest, but pushed his cavalry in hot pursuit, and followed in force. On Tuesday afternoon, Sept. 20, he crossed Cedar creek, and pushed on to Strasburg.

A portion of the rebel cavalry which turned off to Front Royal were pursued, attacked and routed.

On the 22d the rebels were found posted in an almost impregnable position at Fisher's hill, about three miles beyond Strasburg, and at about four o'clock in the evening the attack on their lines was made, Rickett's division directly assaulting them on their left, resting on North mountain, and the 6th and 19th corps in front. Crook carried everything before him, driving the rebels in confusion and sweeping down behind their breastworks. The attack of the 6th and 19th corps was equally effective and successful. It says the whole rebel army appeared to be broken up, fleeing in the utmost confusion. Our army captured 16 pieces of artillery and a great many caissons, artillery horses, &c., &c. Gen. Sheridan was pushing on up the valley so rapidly that he was unable to tell his own or the rebel losses, or to state the number of prisoners he had captured. He says: "Only darkness has saved the whole of Early's army from total destruction." The last we did hear from the rebels they were sent on the same day through the Luray valley; Early's command embraced the famous "Stonewall brigade" and the troops commanding Stonewall Jackson's old corps, and was the élite of the rebel army. What is left of Early's army has abandoned the rebel cause, and is retreating in a rout, as rapidly as possible, by way of Culpeper and Gordonsville, directly for Richmond. The route to Lynchburg is thus unobstructed, and Lee can now prepare to send Richmond to send thither to oppose the victorious and indomitable soldiers of Sheridan. At the last accounts Sheridan was at Woodstock, on Friday.

The Richmond Examiner confirms the report which we recently received from Washington, that Moseby, the notorious guerilla, was wounded in one of the fights. Early was wounded in the thigh, on the 15th inst.; but the rebel paper says he expected to be in the field again in a week or two.

GRANT'S ARMY.

In spite of the pursuit of our cavalry, the rebel raiders succeeded in driving the whole of the captured cattle safely across the James.

A lavish ammunade was kept up on Petersburg on the 19th and 20th.

The arrangements for the exchange of prisoners at Fortress Monroe appear to be working more favorably at present than they did formerly. Over 1,000 rebel prisoners at Fort Delaware were sent up the James river on Monday last, with the understanding that an equal number of Union prisoners would be sent down from Richmond in return.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The firing on the city of Charleston was continued in the regular manner, though the range had been altered, and the shells and portions of it, which had until recently been unvisited by the dreadful messengers sent by our guns are now suffering those visitations. A correspondent from James-island damage is being done to the city. Gen. Jones, the rebel commander at Charleston, would not grant Gen. Foster's request to be allowed to send supplies of food and clothing to our suffering soldiers now prisoners in Georgia. Several of the rebel officers now confined as prisoners on Morris island have expressed a desire to take the oath of allegiance to the National Government. Admiral Dahlgren had gone on an expedition up the coast.

GEORGIA.

Owing to the recent rains, Sherman lies quietly at Atlanta, fortifying the town. Heed wrote a letter denouncing Sherman's conduct in expelling the inhabitants, but Sherman, of whom as of Cæsar it may be said eadem copiosa scripsit quo bellavit, replied in a letter that has not been equalled during the war.

The latest Richmond papers are greatly excited over reports which reach them from Macon, Georgia, to the effect that that Gen. Sherman has sent an informal request to Governor B. Stephens, Vice-President of the rebel Confederacy, Gov. Brown, of Georgia, Herschel V. Johnson, and other prominent citizens of Georgia, to meet him at Atlanta, for the purpose of conferring as to Georgia seceding from the bogus Government, and returning to her allegiance to the Union. Gov. Brown has distasteful the matter.

ALABAMA.

The attack on the city of Mobile had not yet commenced. An expedition sent out from Fort Gaines had destroyed immense rebel salt works and inflicted severe damage on the rebels. The rebels have been destroying great quantities of turpentine and rosin in the vicinity of Mobile, to keep it from falling into the hands of our soldiers.

MISSISSIPPI.

The Vicksburg Herald of Sept 10 says there has been a concentration of rebel forces at Jackson, Miss. Forrest's, Taylor's, Gibson's and Wirt Adams's troops were encamped around that city for several miles. The force was estimated at 20,000 men, with extensive wagon, pontoon and artillery trains. Forrest was still compelled to walk on crutches, from a wound received at Tupelo, but can ride a horse.

LOUISIANA.

Col. Scott, commanding the rebel troops near Baton Rouge, recently sent a proposition to Gen. Herron to surrender from 8,000 to 9,000 men if an unconditional pardon was granted.

The Union and Rebel Commissioners for the exchange of prisoners had an interview at Morganzia, Louisiana, on the 13th inst., and it is hoped that a general exchange may be the result.

MISSOURI—ARKANSAS.

The advices from southeast Missouri and Arkansas go to show the concentration of various scattered rebel detachments, for a simultaneous raid of Missouri, under Gen. Sterling Price, as in progress. A fight between the 3d Missouri militia and a portion of the rebel Shelby's force took place on Monday, Sept. 19, on the Little Rock river, in southeast Missouri. Gen. Price has a force of cavalry and infantry on the Arkansas river, between Little Rock and Fort Smith, and Shelby was said to have between 4,000 and 5,000 men at Pewpatrun, Ark., on the 15th inst. Other detachments of rebels are scattered about in various localities on the Missouri border.

TEXAS.

The operations in Texas have resumed a new shape. Corinna, with the possession of Matamoras, was attacked by the French, whom he defeated on the 6th Sept. on the road to Bagdad. During the action the rebel Col. Ford assisted the French, and Corbina, after directing the French, crossed the Rio Grande, raised the American flag, and as an American citizen attacked Ford, drove him from the field, with the loss of 200 men and nearly a million of dollars' worth of rebel stores.

NAVAL.

Two small steamers, called the Parsons and Island Bell, were captured by our fleet on Lake Erie, on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 19, by a party of about 30 rebel pirates from Canada. According to our treaties with Great Britain, these vessels cannot enter any of the British ports on the lakes.

Several of the pirates have been pursued and captured. Six of them are now in safe keeping on Johnson's island, and the principal agent and several of his accomplices are prisoners on board the United States steamer Michigan, the capture of which vessel was the ultimate object of the piratical foray.

TOWN GOSSIP.

Once—not many weeks since—we were told by our especial lady friend, that nobody wanted to go anywhere, even though the usual conditions existed; that prices were not considered, and that women dressed as much at home, because there was no place to go to. The the time we were inclined to doubt, but every day suggests our doubt and resolves the problem of plenty, especially as it relates to dress and daily life.

This has been opening week, that most eventful time of all the half year to milliners and modistes, and certainly has not been a busy one. Ladies would reveal at any one to believe, not even the most inveterate croaker, that financial distress was the order of the day—judging over the hand. With lace at the value of a king's ransom, whatever tangible sum that may be), and velvet at a sterling value, with the very best of French flowers at fabulous prices, and general trimmings at a wondrous exaltation, a bonnet becomes a matter of such serious consideration as even to tax the purse-book of a millionaire. And yet even in the face of this fact, never before have millinery establishments been so large, and bigness so recklessly parted with their greenbacks as upon this very occasion. All that can be picked of the treasures of earth, or air has been freely given for their adornment, and these airy, fairy creations glitter with the gems of the earth, the marvels of the sea, the trade dress and daily life. All enhanced by the hand of art and turned to the adornment of beauty.

In a few words, never before has so much money been laid on the adornment of the person in a single season of living as upon this very year of our Lord 1864.

In the Metropolitan Theatre, Wednesday, there is at least one compensation, which is, that as luxury advances so does the taste for the drama. Our vocation has not decided on garments that make them a figure of ridicule, but only to be worn by those who can afford to, and we will venture to say that there was never so dressed a house as that which did not never before. Nor will we venture to say that there was ever so much beauty in the same number of persons assembled together, as upon this occasion, which is, that as luxury advances so does the taste for the drama. Our vocation has not decided on garments that make them a figure of ridicule, but only to be worn by those who can afford to, and we will venture to say that there was never so dressed a house as that which did not never before. Nor will we venture to say that there was ever so much beauty in the same number of persons assembled together, as upon this occasion, which is, that as luxury advances more in accordance with the instincts of nature, crowds closely adapted dress to its true principles of common sense.

Another opening that will take place before the paper is in the hands of its readers is one of equal importance, and of equal interest to many. This is the opening of the public establishments for the year. To many of our people the existence of such places is unknown, and to many, but still owned they are to our midst, and while they are to be found somewhere in every large city, thousands speak who labor in the factories and the shops, and who are in the habit of daily marketing and shopping-ing, for the knowledge that will smooth their daily life.

Through all the summer our citizens have borne the heat and discomfort of their homes, their necessities from home-letting, pork-packing and other nuisances, and have not left the city. But now, as it is the period of non-endurance, they have, in a strong body, power for a discontented one, and the Health Officer-Inspector Rode to sweep them away. There seems, somehow, to be a crime upon the public mind to be found in these places, which officials are not willing to brow away. The old saying that "dirt is the source of disease," the only spot of action being through the Board of Health, it must be considered as the source of all the fearful pestilence, who cause more often with such than with the sword.

Why the fortunate few, who can afford, does not set a fashion in the matter of pestilence. Verily the ways of lawyers are various!

The last statistics we recorded the fact that gold had touched 200, and this week we are happy to record the same with the difference that this week brings the downward movement. The precious metal has within the past few weeks fluctuated from point to point until at one time reached 230, since which, with spasmodic efforts at reappreciation, it has gone down—down, until the lower figure has been reached, with a happy assurance to a still further contraction. This is a grateful announcement to make to the public, and yet it will be some time before they can really feel the benefit. This wholesale dealer and speculator will realize the advantage of the value, and the retailer overgrown dealer, tarer or collapse, and his great stock he thrown upon an already overcrowded market; but the petty shopkeeper man or the corner-grocer will, with natural obstinacy, refuse to accept the situation until it is beaten into his thick skull with a financial sledge-hammer. There is a great panic coming in the commercial world, but we doubt much if the working-man be not the gainer. He who is careful and economical, and stores away his greenbacks in these days of plenty, will find in a few months that every dollar is worth two when counted by what it will buy.

The coming week will be one of trembling everywhere but in the city of New York. While all her neighbors are shaking in their shoes at the steady march of the draft, Gothamites are exulting. We can imagine the feelings of many of our citizens who, during the first fright, determined to take time by the forelock, and therefore put in substitutes at an expense to them of different sums, ranging from $900 to $1,200, when they found that New York was exempt and their investments had been made without necessity. The thing is really too fearful to consider, and in one case that we know of has acted with a singular effect. A well-known stock-broker sent his man to the front at an expense of $1,200, duly paid to the negotiator of the contract. News came a day or two since that Patrick, the representative, had been laid out during the rush of Sheridan through the valley of the Shenandoah and was good for a final ticket-of-leave. Our stock-broker doubled up in an instant and took to his bed, and was only prevented from giving up the ghost by a response to his telegrams that Patrick was likely to recover. Since that time he has gradually improved, and at last advices our stockbroking friend is likely in a week or two to be out on crutches, if nothing happens.

While upon this subject let us remark that never since the commencement of this war has a better class of men gone forward, or with more enthusiasm, than at this time. We have heard within a week a recruiting officer say that he had in 20 days raised a company of gentlemen, and our experience of an hour or two in his office corroborates the assertion. The bounties are high and the service is short, the first amounting to about $700, and the last for one year. The soldier for this year's service receives altogether in cash the sum of $892, and with it clothes, rations, and every want supplied, making him, if a reasonable and careful man, independent of outlay. If this is not a spur to patriotism we desire to know what is.

In connection with this matter we see that Mr. Simeon Draper, the new collector of the port, though he has only been two weeks in office, has had over 2,000 applications from those desirous to serve their country. Gen. Sherman, before Atlanta, threatened to form the Northern recruiting agents into a regiment and put them in front, why could not Collector Draper be allowed the same privilege? We know a few tried officers who would be happy to lead them where more glory could be won than over a desk in the custom-house.

To change the subject, let us say a word about the amusements of the town.

Firstly, the opera—German of course we mean—in which the event of the week has been Carl Formes, who made his debut on the first evening of the week in "Robert le Diable." To those who remember him six years ago we will only say that there is a shade of alteration, not for the better, but we also add that his grand voice can afford to deteriorate and still be strong enough and fine enough to make thousands of new converts as it yet holds all its old admirers. The German opera has been a great success, and while we hail the advent of Maretzek we cannot help regretting the necessity that carries away from us Carl Formes and the Teutonic musical element.

Maretzek has made a point financially by filling his subscription list before opening. Already the choice seats command a premium, and the season promises altogether to be a greater success than any for years. The first opera is not yet announced by name.

On Monday, Wallack's opened with what they were pleased to style a new play, which "new play" was simply a re-hash of one played several years since in London under the title of "The Married Bachelor," and also in this city at Burton's Theatre, under its present title. Of the merits of the piece, though the manufacture of that eminent patcher-up of dramatic necessities, Boucicault, the less said the better. Mr. Boucicault himself, if we are not mistaken, was of this opinion, and the play was only produced in London for the purpose of annoying its author, who was anxious to suppress it, though he had sold it to Mr. Webster, the manager of the Haymarket.

The old company remains much about the same, and were welcomed to the stage again in a manner that must have been flattering to their vanity, provided it has not swelled to such extent as to close every pore of the skin. Especially was this welcome extended to Miss Mary Ann Gannon, who, having just escaped from a bed of sickness that at one time threatened to prove fatal, was greeted with more than usual warmth.

At the Olympic the production of the new play "Finesse" has been a success. Notwithstanding the illness of the new favorite, Mr. Holsten, who was to have done the leading part, the whole affair went off smoothly, though why the character should not have been placed in the hands of Mr. Davidge at first is something we cannot conceive, and one of those marvels only known to managers. The next move upon the board is an adaptation of "Martin Chuzzlewit," by that uncertain individual, "a gentleman of this city," and the management announces that its intention is to present the affair "exactly as Dickens wrote it."

At Niblo's three nights a week are given to Forrest and three to the "Duke's Motto," each drawing full houses, and laughing financial tightness to scorn.

The Winter Garden still holds on with Clarke as Major De Bootes, and the public seem satisfied to want nothing else, save now and then a dash of "Toodles." On Thursday of this week Mr. Clarke is to venture on "The Comedy of Errors," doing the Dromio of Syracuse, while a Philadelphia amateur will essay upon the Dromio of Ephesus.

The Broadway still runs Mr. John Owens, and every night tells a fresh story of appreciation. The management has inaugurated Matinées, the first commencing on Saturday next, a movement which, if rightly conducted, cannot fail to be a success.

Heller must feel the attentions of the New York public this season as something a little more than flattering. There has not been a night since his first opening that the house has not been crammed to repletion, so much so that we feel inclined to grumble slightly when we come late. On second thoughts, we promise to forgive Heller if he will tell us privately how that goblin drum business is managed.

The Hippotheatron is announced to open next week in its old quarters opposite the Academy of Music, with a new and powerful company.

NEW MUSIC.

Oliver Ditson & Co. have just published a very capital collection of National Songs under the title of "Trumpet of Freedom." It is just the book for the camp, as it is equally well adopted for singing and playing. The airs are chiefly popular ones, and those that are new will doubtless soon become great favorites with the public. The arrangement is excellent.

BOOK NOTICES.

The American Conflict: A History of the Great Rebellion in the United States of America, 1860–64. Its Causes, Incidents and Results; intended to exhibit especially its Moral and Political Phases, with the drift and progress of American Opinion respecting Human Slavery from 1776 to the close of the War for the Union. By Horace Greeley. Illustrated. Vol. I. O. D. Case & Co, 1864. Octavo, 648 pp.

The future philosophic historian of this war will not lack materials; he will be rather oppressed with the multiplicity of books, pamphlets and papers, as well as of unpublished matter to be explored and sifted. Much may doubtless be easily set aside as of little matter. This cannot be said of this work. Of the Republican party, whose success was the pretext for the secession of the Southern States, and their subsequent war on the General Government, Mr. Greeley was one of the founders and constant exponents. His work is thus the full clear exposition of the principles of the party and facts resulting from them. He goes back to the origin of the Government to show the rise and progress of the anti-Slavery idea, which, when Slavery became a political element, necessarily took form also as a political power. He traces the history of Slavery till the time of the Missouri struggle, giving the details of the Compromise; sketches the career of the Abolition element and the Pro-Slavery reaction, embracing the action of the Churches on the question. Texas and the resulting war with Mexico are then treated of; and then after examining the Kansas troubles, the Dred Scott case, the Cuba project, the John Brown attempt, thus bringing before the reader every point of the struggle down to 1860, he begins his narrative of the campaign which ended in the election of Abraham Lincoln, and gives the history of the war, bringing it in this volume down to the battle of Dranesville. It is rather, it will be seen, a political history, and abounds in extracts from documents, speeches and the like; but the military operations are carefully detailed with clearness and precision, with maps and plans, enabling the reader to follow without difficulty the course of the narrative.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The British Government has announced its intention to leave the question of the seizure of the Georgia to the U. S. Prize Courts. This, of course, puts an end to the chance of any trouble between the two powers.

The Danish question is by no means settled yet.

The Ost Deutsche Post says: "The reports of difficulties which have arisen in the peace negotiations, of new pretensions put forward by the Danish Government as regards Northern Schleswig, are daily renewed. In vain does the Press endeavor to point out the inexorable necessity of Denmark, as she is circumstanced, to conclude peace. The rumor of a postponement of peace still prevails."

The Vienna New Free Press says: "Denmark would never have dared to raise objections as regards the financial question, or threatened to abandon the clauses stipulated in the preliminaries, if she were not backed by the three Powers. Russia, France and England, are now acting in concert with the sole object of paralyzing the work of peace, to save at least Northern Schleswig to Denmark, and to effect a reunion of the Duchies of Denmark by the aid of the fatal question of successions, which still remains pending."

The British Government has given orders to arm all their infantry with breech-loading rifles. Despite its enormous expense it will be well worth it, since it will render 10,000 men equal to three times their number armed as the soldiery are now.

It is reported that Lord Palmerston's hesitation to acknowledge the Mexican empire proceeds from the hesitation of the new Government to acknowledge the debt due the English bondholders.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The New York Manufacturing Jewellers' Association have inaugurated an enterprise which for liberality and popularity outdoes anything of the kind we have been acquainted with. They have engaged the Academy of Music for the evenings of the 28th, 29th and 30th of September, for three grand concerts by first-class artists, among whom are D'Angri, Fanny Stockton, Mr. S. C. Campbell, Mr. W. Castle and others, besides a grand orchestra of 60 pieces, under the very competent direction of Mr. John P. Cooke. The price of tickets to these concerts is $1, which is a very reasonable one, but—and here the joke comes in—the directors give to each purchaser, in addition to a ticket to the concert, a beautiful present, varying in value from $1 to $500 at usual retail prices. These presents consist of pianos, sewing-machines, gold and silver watches, diamonds, silver tea-sets, castors, jewellery of various kinds, and all sorts of knick-knackeries, of which an immense stock is on exhibition at the Company's Depot, Nos. 542 and 544 Broadway, at which place only tickets are sold and the presents distributed. The presents are given at the depot, at the time of purchase, so that there is no delay and the purchaser is not kept in doubt as to what he is to receive. A large amount of tickets has been sold, and among the thousands who crowd the place daily we have yet to hear of a single individual who has expressed the slightest dissatisfaction. We repeat the whole scheme is the fairest and the most liberal we ever heard of, and we are not at all surprised at the unprecedented success it has met with. We advise all who like to listen to good music and are not unwilling to accept a sure and a good thing to call on Mr. Elias, the actuary, Nos. 542 and 544 Broadway, purchase a ticket and try their luck. You may get a piano, but you are sure to get the worth of your money at any rate.

—— The Printers' Union has been dissolved. The New York World says: "The New York papers, like those in other cities, have for many years been to a great extent under the control of this combination, both as regards the compensation for labor and the internal regulation of their offices. The combination, however, heavily increased the rates of pay required from the employers at a time when the cost of all materials gave publishers a heavy load to carry; an advertisement for workmen not connected with the Union was offered for insertion in the Tribune; the men employed in the office demanded its exclusion, and struck in order to establish their control over the advertising of the paper; and this turned the scale. The combination had overshot its mark; the different papers quietly made arrangements to secure other men and to discharge all connected with the Union, until about a week ago it was announced that the Herald alone employed compositors belonging to that body. It now appears that the Union has been compelled, by the consequences of its own headstrong folly, to abdicate its only really important function."

—— A grand and imposing meeting in behalf of the Union cause and candidates was held on the 22d Sept. in the Brooklyn Academy of Music and in the street adjacent. Over 20,000 people were present. Military.—Gen. Hood having made complaints against the cruelty of Gen. Sherman having ordered the Southern women and children to leave Atlanta, Gen. Sherman administers a severe reply. We have only room for the concluding part. He writes as well as he fights: "I have not accused you of heartless cruelty, but merely instance these cases of very recent occurrence, and could go on and enumerate hundreds of others and challenge any fair man to judge which of us has the heart of pity for the families of a 'brave people.' I say it is a kindness to these families of Atlanta to remove them now at once from scenes that women and children should not be exposed to, and the brave people should scorn to commit their wives and children to the rude barbarians who thus, as you say, violate the laws of war, as illustrated in the pages of its dark history. In the name of common sense, I ask you not to appeal to a just God in such a sacrilegious manner—you, who, in the midst of peace and prosperity, have plunged a nation into civil war, 'dark and cruel war,' who dared and badgered us to battle, insulted our flag, seized our arsenals and forts that were left in the honorable custody of a peaceful ordnance sergeant, seized and made prisoners of war the very garrison sent to protect your people against negroes and Indians, long before any overt act was committed by the 'to you' hateful Lincoln Government, tried to force Kentucky and Missouri into the rebellion spite of themselves, falsified the vote of Louisiana, turned loose your privateers to plunder unarmed ships, expelled Union families by the thousand, burned houses, and declared by act of your Congress the confiscation of all debts due Northern men for goods had and received. Talk thus to the marines, but not to me, who have seen these things, and who will this day make as much sacrifice for the peace and honor of the South as the best born Southerner among you. If we must be enemies, let us be man, and fight it out as we propose to-day, and not deal in such hypocritical appeals to God and humanity. God will judge us in due time, and He will pronounce whether it be more humane to fight with a town full of women and the families of a 'brave people' at our back, or to remove them in time to places of safety among their own friends and people."

Naval.—The U. S. sloop-of-war Brooklyn arrived at the Charlestown Navy Yard on the 20th Sept. This vessel led in the engagement at Mobile, and suffered more from the fire of Fort Morgan than any other. Fifty-nine shots entered her sides, most of them on the berth-deck, and 73 shots took effect in other parts of her. On her decks are to be seen more than 1,200 pounds of iron, which were poured into her from the rebel batteries.

He says they were pursued by him, and that he has got the principal agent prisoner on board, and many accomplices. All is safe at present. The object was to capture the steamer Michigan. Col. Hall has six of the pirate party on Johnson's island.

Accidents and Offences.—On the 22d of Sept. Dr. Issachar Zacharie, a well-known chiropodist of this city, was shot in his own house, No. 760 Broadway, with a five-barrelled revolver in the hands of Mr. Samuel M. Barnett. Two shots were fired. One ball entered the doctor's cheek on the right side of his nose, and passed into his head beyond the reach of a probe. It is feared the wound will prove fatal. Barnett immediately after delivered himself up, and Justice Shandley committed him to await the result of the injuries. There are several different versions as to the cause that led to the affray, and at present there is a mystery surrounding the whole affair, which will no doubt be hereafter unraveled. Barnett is an Englishman, a single man, aged 32 years. Dr. Zacharie is a native of Charleston, S. C., aged about 45 years, and has a wife and several children residing in this city.

—— The past week was pre-eminently fatal for railroad accidents. On the 21st Sept. the fast line train going Eastward on the Pennsylvania railroad ran into a freight train, demolished the engine, killed six and wounded 13. On the same day a locomotive exploded on the same line near Latrobe, which smashed the engine, destroyed six cars of cattle and killed three men. And on the same day an accident happened on the Hudson River Railroad, occasioned by the axletree breaking, and throwing the entire train from the track. Two boys in the baggage car were killed, and a brakeman and one passenger, a lady, injured.

—— The Nazione, of Florence, says: "In the villages of Antignano, Arcuella and Due Porte, which stand on the same hill in the province of Naples, reside about 30 men and women, who, from a singular religious fanaticism, have made a vow never to speak. For some years past they have maintained silence. A tradesman (a grocer) is mentioned, who carries on his business without uttering a word. Should a customer enter his shop to purchase anything, he weighs and sells. If the buyer has any observations to make, he listens and does as he is requested. Besides, his wife speaks for him, and most ungrudgingly."

Chit-Chat.—A prisoner of war advertises from Johnson's island, in a New York journal, for a substitute to take his place there: "Wanted, a substitute to stay here in my place. He must be 30 years old, have a good moral character, A-1 digestive powers, and not addicted to writing poetry. To such a one all the advantages of a strict retirement, army rations, and an unmitigated watchfulness to prevent them from getting lost, are offered for an indefinite period. Diphtheria has now been prevailing extensively for about 40 years in France and England, long before kerosene was used at all.

—— The Philadelphia Press has the following: There is a startling rumor in town to the effect that McClellan will not vote for Pendleton, nor Pendleton for McClellan. One is so unequivocally for peace that he cannot support a candidate who receives his pay from the War Department, and the other being "The Soldier's Friend" can scarcely be expected to endorse a man who was in every respect the soldier's enemy.

—— A man on Cape Cod, who had separated from his wife, married a second with whom he lived a year and a half, and then died. WASTED COAL.

Coal is $12 to $13 per ton. That means something when a winter's supply has to be laid in. In the use of it the most prodigal wastefulness is practised, doubtless because it is black and dirty, and does not look nice; it ought therefore to be got out of the way as soon as possible.

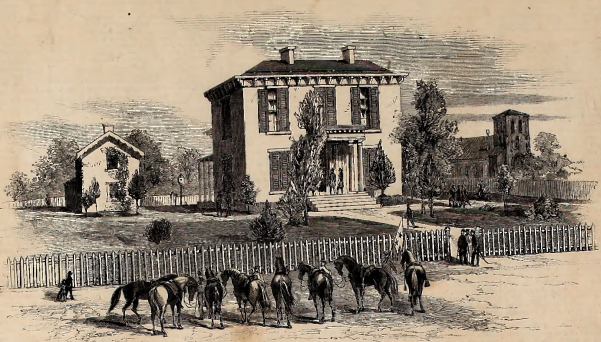
One-third of every ton of coal burned by servants is wasted—not alone in reckless burning, but in actual, wanton waste. The coal is as certainly lost as if a third were left in the street instead of being put in the cellar. It is wasted in the ashes; fresh coal falls out of the grate in replenishing it, and this, with that remaining in the fire at night, and charred half-burned lumps, amounts to fully one-third of the quantity actually used. This is a most unnecessary and wicked waste, and if servants cannot be induced or made by surveillance to correct the abuse, it would pay householders to look after it themselves.

In the matter of burning coal there is also a great want of intelligence, and it is not to be expected that common servants will know, or care much about saving it. The grate or the range is stuffed so full that the oven top is loaded with it, so that the fire will not die out or require looking after; then the draft is opened and the money, or what is the same, the heat, goes flying up the chimney.

With a little forethought all this could be prevented, and a ton of coal made to last three months instead of one. A good, bright fire can be steadily maintained with coal with less trouble than with any other kind of fuel, but not raking, poking and piling in green fuel continually. After breakfast the fire should be cleared of ashes, if there are any, and fresh fuel put on to fill the grate moderately. Let the over damper be turned up so as to heat it, and leave the small top door open, more or less, according to the intensity of the heat required. In this way air enters over the top of the fire and maintains a far better combustion, and consequently greater heat, than when the draft dampers are thrown open. A washing can be done or "ironing" accomplished with one-third less coal than is generally thought necessary to use.

So far as sifting ashes for the cinders they contain is concerned, it is hopeless to expect much change. Hundreds of poor families in cities live off of the waste of their improvident neighbors, and in this way there is something used which would otherwise be lost, but it seems to us that charity should be practised in a different and more profitable manner. If the proverb be true that "Charity begins at home," then we have a still stronger argument against this wasteful practice. Cinders will burn admirably in small cylinder stoves, and heat a nursery or laundry as hot as it should be. Every shovelfull saved is a shovelfull of coal put in the cellar, and a hint to the wise is enough on this point.

Fashionable ladies will be pleased to learn that the new style "Alexandra" and "Empress" Undersleeve is now offered at the Ladies' Outfitting Rooms, 505 Broadway, just below the St. Nicholas.



SHERIDAN'S CAMPAIGN.

THE Shenandoah valley has been so often the field of operations, that curiosity is naturally stimulated to see how places so often mentioned really look. In future years many a party of tourists will traverse it to visit the nooks where so many gallant men fought and fell. Hences will be pointed out and be gazed on as we now those which gained celebrity in the Revolution.

Smithfield, or Wizard Clip.

This little town, which Averill, after an obstinate fight, had to vacate in the last days of September, but which we soon recovered, has been sketched by our Artist. It is a small village, many of the houses showing signs of the recent battle, being perforated with shot and shell.

It is near Charlestown, on the turnpike, and is also termed Middleway, but throughout the country around it has for half a century been the name of Wizard Clip, from strange events which occurred at the house of a Mr. Livingston, now in ruins, but which for a long time attracted general attention. Articles of dress and boots even were mysteriously cut into strips generally by a spiral clip going round and round the doomed article. This clipping or cutting gave the place the name of Wizard Clip, and to this day the spot is regarded with terror by the people. The lot is now used by the Catholics as a burial-place, but few of the Smithfield people could be induced by any offer to reside at it. Some of our troops were for a time encamped on it.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN GEN. GRANT AND GEN. SHERIDAN AT CHARLESTOWN, VA., BEFORE SHERIDAN'S ATTACK ON EARLY, SEPT 17.

SMITHFIELD OR WIZARD CLIP, VIRGINIA.

Sheridan's Headquarters, Charlestown—Scene of his Interview with Gen. Grant, Saturday, Sept. 17.

The recent glorious victory of Gen. Sheridan gives an interest to all his movements, and we sketch with pleasure his Headquarters in Charlestown, where, on the 17th, Lieut.-Gen. Grant and himself planned the recent successful movement. Our Artist sketched it as the two, after their conference in the room on the left, came out of the house together.

This house, standing, as will be seen, not far from the Episcopal church, belongs to Mr. Butterfield.

Leetown.

Leetown is a small place of some eight houses, and once belonged to Gen. Charles Lee, the eccentric officer of the Revolutionary army, whose genius is now scarcely doubted. Here he spent his last days, with no companions but his hooks and his dogs. Five powerful springs have their source here, sending out good mill streams. At one of these in the sketch some cavalry are watering their horses; a mill-race runs from it to the right. Another spring is further back.

The mill in the centre, where the road turn off, belongs to Mr. Barlch, the present proprietor of the town, whose residence is on the extreme right. On the left, on the Winchester pike, is Mr. Snyder's residence.

OUR SPECIAL ARTIST PASSING NEWCOMBER'S FORD ON THE OPEQUAN AT A DISADVANTAGE.

SCENES IN SHERIDAN'S SHENANDOAH VALLEY CAMPAIGN.—FROM SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, J. E. TAYLOR.

Newcombe's Ford on the Opequan.

The Opequan has just given name to a victory, the most undisputed in all our glorious list. And as the little stream has thus risen to an historic greatness, a sketch of its course is not amiss. In sending the sketch our Artist says: "Here I had much difficulty in getting into our lines from Martinsburg, the picket on the opposite side of the stream being a German. It took some time and more labor to make him understand that I was a friend and had a pass. He finally agreed to let me go over, which I accomplished by stripping and fording, the recent freshet having made the ford by no means shallow. This ford is near Martinsburg, and is guarded by Averill's cavalry. It has been the scene of several skirmishes during the war."

MEN-OF-WAR'S MEN.

Our gallant tars have not perhaps been fairly dealt with by us as illustrators of the time. The various army organizations, the corps, divisions, brigades and regiments have all been depicted in mass and in detail, so that many of the regiments are recognised throughout the country.

But the men who fought under Winslow, under Foote, under Dupont, under Farragut, under Porter, under Dahlgren, Reservations shave, and we give this time a group from life, drawn with all the fidelity of a daguerreotype, as easy, as graceful, as unstudied as the gallant tars themselves. All honor to our navy, which may be outstripped by the fleet heels of a thief, but never fails to show of what metal it is made if it can once get them to stand.

THE COUNTRY MARKET AT HARPER'S FERRY.

GEN. STEVENSON, in command at Harper's Ferry, has recently, by a wise discretion, allowed the farmers of Loudon county to come over the mountains with produce to Harper's Ferry. Our Artist has sketched the new country market thus established, and by it our readers will see somewhat of the regulations.

The farmers are permitted to come, irregardless of their political sentiments, to a place on the margin of the Shenandoah, near the town, where a market is held daily. An enclosure bounded by a rope near the ruined railroad bridge, and strongly guarded, is the prescribed space where citizens and soldiers equally share its benefits and enjoy fresh butter, eggs, meat and other necessaries, at prices which for cheapness excite the envy of New Yorkers at least: butter at 50 cents, eggs $2 a 100, meats of all kinds at 25 cents and less.

ACCORDING to Confederate interpretation, "O. S." means "Cousin Sal," as "U. S." stands for "Uncle Sam."

THE BEE AND THE ROSE.

BY ROSENBERG.

I.

From blossom to blossom a Honey-Bee roamed,
But most he loved the lips of the Rose,
Whose flushing cheek to the wanton Sun
Its beauty and perfume like incense throws.

And thither he came from hour to hour,
Pausing to kiss her on careless wing,
Till the wind and the ray their task had done,
And the hundred-leaved flower was a faded thing.

II.

Alas! the poor Rose! She was withered and pale—
No more the faithless Honey-Bee came;
Sorrow had rifled her crimson lip
And trouble had tainted her blush of flame,
While many a younger beauty lured
Bosom and cheek as he passed her by,
And bade him pause with her, her sweets to sip,
And murmured and laughed at the faded one's sigh.

III.

But the storm, it arose, and the wind awoke,
On his wing the pleading raindrops fell,
The Tulip closed her leaf when he came—
The Marygold never "had loved him well."
The Daisy wondered "he looked so low—"
The Lily appealed "to her purity—"
The Ladysmock talked of her name and her fame,
And none sheltered the soiled and the stricken Bee.

IV.

Then he came to the frail and the faded Rose,
From her withered lip no cold word came—
Her love lived yet in her dying leaf,
And she told him not of her tears of shame
She had no memory harsh and hard
Of wounded love and of rifled youth,
Her words were neither of woe nor of grief,
She spake to him but of her love and her truth.

V.

The wind and the rain came and scattered her leaves
And smote to the earth the wounded Bee—
Kiss-like on his lip, her last leaf fell,
In the selfless kiss of her sympathy.
There are things as frail yet not so true—
Things that can laugh and can love again—
Heaven will pardon the truth that is frail,
It is not the Love, but the Lie is the stain.

MRS. NETTLETON DRIGGS.

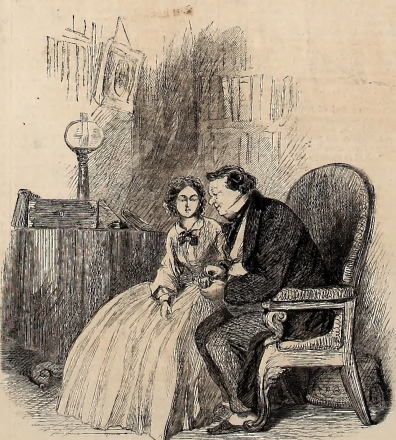
BY J. W. WATSON.

"It certainly has very fine eyes, Robert."

"Y-e-s! yes, fine eyes, very fine child."

"How pleadingly the poor thing looks at us. Upon my word I never thought of such a thing when I came here, but I am almost of a mind to take that child home with me. What's your name, my dear?"

"Joey, ma'am," answered the child, timidly.



"Would you like to go home with me, Joey?"

"Yes, ma'am!" answered the little one, eagerly, the light sparkling up in her brown eyes with all the childish desire for change.

"What do you say to it, Robert? She is not so very young as to be much trouble; I can bring her up as my own maid, you know."

Mr. Robert Leroy looked sideways at the little one, twisted his mouth slightly, and gave his chin the least perceptible scratch, then answered:

"Just as you please, my dear, you know what is best."

POPPING THE QUESTION.

For though Mr. Robert Leroy was accustomed to being consulted on any and every matter connected with his household economy, the idea of offering opposition had deported from him many years before, as by profound calculation he found that invariably upon all argument in which he took part against Mrs. Robert, defeat was the consequence. He, therefore, like a true philosopher, after giving every matter upon which his consent was asked a sobd consideration of at least thirty seconds, consented. The question involved in the present case was simply this:

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Leroy in the course of certain wanderings, the object of which it is useless to record, at being no part of the present history, stood together looking at the hundreds of children committed to the public care of the city of New York. It was no part of their errand, as Mrs. Robert had said, to take one of these little ones away with them, but it was so fated that the brown eyes and laughing mouth of Joey had attracted the not unkindly though somewhat stern notice of the lady, and occasioned the resolve she had but just communicated to the gentleman. The child who was the object of the notice was a fine girl of ten, physically forward for her age, and in spite of the coarse blue cotton gown and close cropped hair was unquestionably pretty. Indeed, under the gaze of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Leroy, and the excitement of the lady's question, with the color flushing into her face and the light dancing into her eyes, Joey Burton was more than pretty, she was beautiful.

"Indeed, I don't think you could do better, ma'am. You couldn't have picked out a finer girl on the whole place, I tell you that honestly," was the superintendent's response to Mrs. Robert's announcement that it was her intention to remove the little public waif and take it to her own house.

"Let me see!" continued that gentleman, referring to a large book, which he dragged with difficulty out of its recess and on to his desk. "Let me see, twenty-three, eighty-two, Josephine Burton, came in June 4th, 1832, exactly six years ago, ma'am; bless me, how time flies; was then four years old, neither father nor mother, both died with cholera, supposed to be English by birth, no relations, no inquiry even been made. Thats all we have, ma'am, about her. I don't think you'll ever be troubled to give her up. He! he! he!" and Mr. James Jenkins laughed a little obsequious laugh behind his desk, at what he considered an excellent joke.

The formalities of taking the child from its charity home were few, and the packer of its worldly property, such as Mrs. Robert would allow it to take away, was a matter quickly done, and the little Josephine was soon on her way to a new home, too much elated with the idea of change to feel sorrow at parting with those who had been her companions for almost all that she could remember of her life.

Have you noticed Joey since she has her new dresses, Robert? Don't you think she is dreadfully improved?" was Mrs. Robert's questioning of her husband a few days after the introduction of Joey to her new home.

Mr. Robert Leroy's eyes had followed the girl as she crossed the room, and answered, that as he were any criterion of his opinions, he did think her "dreadfully improved," for his thoughts ran upon his childless master's desire of early years and the then unbearing desire that for half that time had been unbreathed, even to himself, once awoke; and he thought of how great a change it might have been in his life had he been father to one like this little waif, new thrown upon his hands, for whom no inquiry had ever been made. Mr. Robert in his own heart did not object to the taking of the child into his home, but he did object, though not with a word of spoken remonstrance, to the child as a companion, thinking that him take the place of a boy at least, and act out the desire he felt so make it that for which he had once so longed; but the will of fate Robert had learned to submit to, and it was understood in the household that Joey was under the charge of the housekeeper, and that her duties were to learn the sad mystery of a servant, especially one related to becoming Mrs. Robert's own maid.

Yes, she was certainly improved, and the child was gaining fresh bloom and beauty each day, and new grace into her movements, while she in her turn brought a new life into the steady, quiet household, and never yet had been the step or voice of a child. Joey was everywhere, always with a laugh in her eyes, and a willing though weak hand to assist everybody, and to settle any dispute; the question of the child, even under the censure of her childish faults none ever showed anger to little Joey or frowned at looking on her for a minute's sight than that of a universal pet. To this only one exception must be made, one who though when taxed with her enmity laughed, and who occasioned by her laugh, and yet never succeeded in dispelling the belief from the minds of those who accused her of hatred toward the foundling. This exception was Margaret Stone, who, though not claiming long occupancy of her position, arrogated an authority in the household which brought tears to grief as often as an appeal had been taken by her outraged fellow-servants to the Leroy tribunal. Margaret was tall and sharp-featured, rarely ever never smiled, was worn out at spells, sometimes lasting for days, to preserve almost entire silence, barely using enough of language to carry her through her ordinary duties, and then again breaking forth in a torrent of talk the larger part of which would be complaint and invective, the latter ill-borne through life to a day, and ending with bringing her into a state of war with the entire servants' hall. Margaret was Mrs. Robert's maid, and to that lady, when circumstrated with far dissension, declared it was only zeal in her cause, and her dislike to the hypocrisy and ingratitude of her fellow-servants, that caused it. Among the servants there were many whispers of the last trait being prominent in their account, but if it was so none had ever yet succeeded in learning guilt upon the part of Margaret Stone was Mrs. Leroy's maid, and though among the servants she sneered at her coffee, and almost daily made some sarcastic remark concerning it, and leaving service, yet when the little Joey came among them, and the understanding was that at some future day, when years had added to her size, she was to assume Margaret Stone's place, she found at once a deep and implacable enemy in her predecessor.

And yet the years went on, and Joey never abated the good humor and willingness that made her a favorite. Of all the visitants of that house there were none but knew of the beauty of Mrs. Robert's maid, for now Joey was installed in her new position, and Margaret Stone having at last made it a point to be left entirely out of the other servants, so that they had gone in a body to Mrs. Robert, and declared that they could no longer live in the house with her, had been discharged, vowing vengeance against all, and especially against Joey, on whom they chose to settle the burden of hatred. Many days' consultation did not Mrs. Robert receive on her new maid, then only thirteen, but a woman in handiness and dignity, and many an admiring eye was cast upon the little beauty by susceptible young men who had the entree to the Leroy mansion.

And still the years went on, and Joey spent them happily and peacefully, with no dream of ambition disturbing her heart. She knew that she was a servant, and even though always a favored one, she never forgot or neglected about this position. This was the case when Joey at fifteen first saw Lambert Littlejohn, an under clerk in the house of Leroy and Sharp, who sometimes came to bring the letters or receive the commands of of Mr. Robert when it did not please him to spend any part of his day at the counting-house. Lambert was almost a boy, being only three years the senior of Joey, and was in the receipt of the munificent sum of six dollars per week salary from the house of Leroy and Sharp, a salary that just kept him in a certain number of fashionable suits per annum, well patent leather to match, his hat bond, being a long credit on the future, granted him by an uncle who gave this credit as he share towards setting the young man forward in life. There was nothing vicious in the lad, but he loved the theatre better than the counting-room, and had more faith in a first-class frolic than in devotion to his desk. It was not a difficult thing for these two to make acquaintance, even though Lambert was obliged to make short errands at Mr. Robert Leroy's, and still more difficult for them to make clandestine meetings, and again less difficult for them to do what the world generally terms, fall in love. It was the first offering of devotion of the boy upon Joey's shrine, and crude as it was, with her it was molten gold. She hung over the passionate declarant as he lay before her with a belief that knew of no shadow of doubt, and dared everything, even deceit and falsehood, to be with him, or to receive his letters brimming with wild declarations of devotion.

When all the house was quiet, and Joey was supposed to be slumbering, she would steal out from the house by an alley that led into a side street. There, under the shadow of a huge buttonwood, half in the alley and half in the street, she would meet her lover, and fearing to venture for a walk, they would stand for hours to repeat the old, old story, and part to meet again the next evening. It was on one of these that they were so engaged that a female figure brushed close to them, halted an instant, put up her hand to hold silence for a moment, gave them a fierce look, and then pass so quickly down the street and out of sight as to leave them in wonder at the celerity of her movements. Lambert was the first to recover from a half shiver as the figure passed away, and something prompted a recognition. The name of Margaret Stone came to his lips, but for the moment it was instantly ahead of her old enemy seized her. It was useless for Lambert to attempt reassurance, or by argument convince her that the figure was a stranger's, and that Margaret would not be out alone at such an hour; the fear had settled upon her, and that night Joey cried into a feverish pillow in her room and wept bitterly over the love of which she feared the end.

Days passed, and one came that brought terror to the heart of Joey Burton. Under the shadow of the buttonwood tree stood the two. The night was dark, so dark that even the passers upon the main street could see but a dim outline as rushed up against the dark wall and under the darker shade. The arm of Lambert was half around the waist of the girl, and his head was bent down to meet her ear, when a quick hand was laid upon his shoulder, turning him around, so that what little light came from a distant street lamp fell upon the face and the figure of Margaret Stone stood before them, her face within a foot of his.

A sharp, quick, "What's this?" from her lips.

Then a scared Lambert, doggedly, shaking off the hand from his shoulder.

"How long is this to go on?" she said, after a minute or pause of fierce scrutiny.

"As long as I please," answered the boy; "dye hear that?"

"I hear it;" she repeated, slowly, drawing her breath with almost a hiss. "Do I hear it? Yes, Lambert Littlejohn, and others shall hear it also. Do you think I am to be cajoled and know as you are here night after night, clasping that white-faced thing to your breast, and do nothing to prevent it? Do you know how I have kept my eyes and ears open as much as you once told me that you loved me?"

There was no answer came from Lambert, but he seemed to draw back from the girl.

"You are beginning to understand, then, that I am conscious of the shrinking of the girl.

"How many months have gone over your head since you spoke to me of love, and were telling that same treasure, and drew me towards you as you now do her? Oh, you're only a boy, but you're old in deception! And I, I was only a girl, and I believed you—though I knew you were playing with this girl all the time. Come, I want you to go home with me."

"Don't make a fool of yourself, Margaret, all your fuss won't have any effect on Joey."

"Joey, indeed! Her name is Josephine, hear him! Lambert Littlejohn, do you expect that God will prosper your love, or bring anything good out of it? I have wished to warn her, but I ought rather to leave you to yourselves, the punishment would would surely come."

"Well, why don't you?" said Lambert, sullenly.

"Leave me to myself, and go home; you needn't stay for me to go with you. I don't want ever to speak to you again after this night."

The girl clinched forward her head and, with her hands clenched, stared hard into his face without speaking; and then, suddenly turning upon her heel, she left him as hastily:

"As for you, my hitherhate fall on you! You've done nothing but cross my path from first to last, and now you've got what I would have you with a word, do you think I wouldn't do it? Let me tell you, fool, that it was I who gave that child to Mrs. Robert. I had her in charge, and her hand clenched before her. "He couldn't then have got away from me, but that I had my cause to ask him to spare it, and then to—ruin you. He were like a dog to do my bidding, and he did it yet, though he is now snarling at me. Take him, girl, you're welcome to each other; take him, and take ruin and ruin with him."

And then, with her last word, she plunged into the darkness and was gone, leaving behind her the unconscious Joey, held fainting in the arms of Lambert Littlejohn.

That night a shivering, hopeless girl crept coldly back to the Leroy House, and awoke the next morning with a raging fever. Days and weeks passed on before she would come down, and then it was to encounter a new trouble. Mrs. Robert Leroy had received an anonymous letter, informing her of the clandestine meetings between Joey and Lambert Littlejohn, and had determined to end them. For that purpose she had sent for the girl, and Joey, weak and unhappy, confessed all, and, still heartsick with the storm of that terrible evening, was ready to promise anything. That night a tap, as of some substance thrown, came upon the bedroom window, and Joey opened it to see. No sooner was the sash raised than a pebble flew in, bringing with it this letter:

"Oh, Joey, do you intend that they should separate us for ever? Once more only meet me this night by the tree, and I will be true to you, I will leave you, never to return. Only once more!

Poor Joey, with a heart torn between love and duty, gazed for a moment into the darkness for the one Lambert standing opposite with his arms stretched out in supplication, and the sight was too much. In a moment her head was on, and then a few pebbles she was in his arms, under the dark and solemn branches of the buttonwood, and in an hour she was Lambert Littlejohn's wife.

Years of happiness, of repentance, a weeping, downcast bride, with nothing but what she stood in, the wife of a penniless, unemployed boy.

We shall not follow over the next three years, years of toil, destitution, sickness and death, and find Joey a widow with one child. Three years before, Joey, in spite of those heavy lights and her marriage, she had alone sought the presence of Mrs. Robert Leroy, and had borne a stern reproach and from that lady, and a declaration was published that as she had made her bed so must she sleep on it, which poor Joey received as a sentence of eternal banishment, and fled from her presence, leaving a number of ingratitude. Weeks after, when Mrs. Robert relented, and would have bidden the poor castaway back, there was no trace of her, and though orders were issued that if ever she was heard of by any of the servants, the intelligence was to be immediately communicated, no word of Joey ever came to the ears of Mrs. Leroy. Once a while Mr. Robert would look up from his book or paper, on some dreary night, when he was toasting his knees over the fire to hear a long, low, suppressed sigh, would hazard a few words, surmise, or wonder with Mrs. Robert as to the whereabouts of the poor girl, and then the subject was put away for weeks, until something again recalled it.

During all this time Mr. and Mrs. Lambert were never like to meet, save upon the sea of life from point to point, struggling with bitter poverty and starvation. A little copying, a transient employment of a few days, an appeal to his former friends, to far-off relations, and the hopelessness of despair set in upon the boy-man, and step by step he sank deeper and deeper into misery and the lowest haunts of intemperance, and before half a year had passed over the heads of the child couple, it was nothing unusual to see Mr. Lambert reeling home at midnight, or after, to throw himself, half unconscious, on the poverty-covered couch, and sleep a drunken sleep for half the following day.

A few months after came their child, and the little creature was ushered into the world with a drunken father and a mother unable to understand the intelligence of its birth, and dependent on the charity of neighbors, almost as poor as she herself, and without a friend to call upon for parents, for rags to cover it, or even a few months' food. Under the stress of his new position, Lambert became somewhat altered, and made a fresh struggle, but the industry was lacking, and once more he sank into the old habit. With them came neglect and a haze of his wife and child, and Joey drank the cup to the very dregs, passing through every stage of misery and degradation.

The third year was far gone, and it was one hot, sweltering night in August, when the very walls of the houses seemed to be second burning with the absorbed heat of the day, and not a breath of air came in through the four pane hole of a window, that Joey had risen from a sleepless couch and stood looking out upon the roofs about her and dreaming of the child days, when she had been among the hundreds of walls like herself, a poor, friendless, homeless child days, when she had found peace and happiness under the care of Mrs. Leroy; and then the hot scare tricked down her face, and she shuddered at the thought of the moment desperate love in the pressing throng, and that she then would be free, free as air, to go through the world and regain her past, and to have once more prosperity. The head of Joey swam and throbbed under the horror of her imagining, and she struggled on almost with a plunge, and then fell, and lay half mad, half dead for over her burning temples. It was only for an instant. But in that instant the surging crowd caught her, and with a cry, a shriek, a wail, and a curse, she was borne on many yards until she stood alone, staring blankly, stupidly, into the eyes of a policeman, and in the excitement of the moment, a colored woman carried in the arms of a stout laborer into a near by drug-store.

For nearly an hour the woman who had carried the child remained from one swoon to fall into another, until at last she returned to life, to find herself upon the lounge of the back room of the store, and only the proprietor and herself one and a stout, middle-aged, rather good-featured man standing over her, and looking somewhat anxiously down upon her face. At last she could distinguish the words, subdued, but seeming to her stunned ears more like words spoken miles away than coming from the two men who were gazing at her.

"What do you think now, doctor?" said the stout gentleman.

"Coming round, sir, coming round. I think she wants nourishment more than anything else. Looks bad altogether."

"Poor thing! poor thing! Couldn't you give her anything, doctor, to fetch her round? Fetch her round if you can, sir. You shall be paid for it. There's nothing like no use so much as people fetched round."

"Thank you! thank you! I'll do the best can," said the apothecary, pleased at the title of doctor as well as by the offer of payment.

"Don't you think a little brandy-and-water, now, would do her good? What do you say to that?"

The apothecary said to that, he thought it would, and glad of any suggestion that would help him out of his ignorance, proceeded forthwith to administer the stimulant. Joey swallowed a mouthful or two with a shudder, and then sat up, and looking wildly around, asked:

"Where am I?"

"Just where you ought to be, child, among friends," said the stout gentleman.

"Friends!" muttered Joey, vacantly, as she looked from one to the other. "Friends!"

The stout gentleman coughed slightly behind his hand, and then repeated the word, though somewhat subdued in tone—"Friends!"

"Where is Willie?" she said, quickly and wildly.

"Willie?" questioned the stout gentleman, looking all around the shop as though he suspected the object of inquiry might be somewhere concealed among the bottles or boxes of the establishment.

Recalled by the sound of her own words, Joey stared fearfully at the stout gentleman, and then with one long, dry sob, she clasped her hands over her face and sank heavily back on the couch.

"Oh, come, come now!" coaxed the stout gentleman, "don't take on so. If you want anything you shall have it. What do you think she wants, doctor? Do you think a little drop more brandy-and-water now would do her good?"

The doctor thought it would, and proceeded accordingly to administer it, and then finding that his patient refused a further draft, took a tremendous swallow himself, by way of illustrating to her that his assertion of its being good was true.

Once again Joey sat up, and looked more calmly on the two men who were ministering to her.

"Where do you live?" asked the stout gentleman.

Joey shook her head slowly.

"I mean where is your home?" he repeated, in an apologetic tone.

"I have no home."

"No home! God bless me! how extraordinary! No home! Why, I never heard of such a thing! No home!"

"No home!" echoed Joey, vacantly.

"No home! Dear me, doctor, did you hear that? Why, you're very young to have no home. Isn't she, doctor?"

"Quite so," responded the doctor, finishing, with a swallow, the brandy-and-water. "Very young!"

"Something must be done about this, doctor; it won't do for any one so young to have no home. Ain't got any friends either, I s'pose?" he said, turning quickly to Joey.

She shook her head slowly, as before.

"Something must be done about this, doctor. Eh! what do you advise? She must be taken care of, or else she'll be falling down in the street again, and then maybe you can't fetch her round. Now, then, if she hain't got any home, a home must be found for her," and the stout gentleman took the apothecary aside, and after a few earnest words a large wallet came out from his pocket with a jerk, and a transfer of something was made from it into the hands of the other.

"What did you say your name was, my child?" asked the stout gentleman of Joey, who had not as yet said her name was anything, but answered him:

"Joey—Joey—Bur—Lambert—No! Josephine Littlejohn."

"Josephine Littlejohn! Eh! not a bad name. I shall call you Joey now—Josephine is too long. What do you say to that, Joey?"

Joey smiled a serious smile, and looked up gratefully in his face, thanking him by her looks for his kind words.

"Well now, Joey, what do you say to staying here for a few days with this gentleman's wife upstairs until you get stronger, when we'll see what can be done for you?"

"Oh, no! oh, no!" said Joey, springing to her feet with vehemence, but staggering back again to the lounge. "I cannot stay here—I must go in search of Willie!"

"Willie!" said the stout gentleman, somewhat confused. "Who's Willie?"

Joey glanced from his face to that of the apothecary, but was silent.

"Doctor, don't you think you'd better go up to your good lady and tell her of this arrangement. She'll want to make some preparation, you see."

The doctor thought he had, and immediately set out to put the thought in execution. No sooner was the door closed than the stout gentleman seated himself on the lounge beside Joey, and said:

"Now then, Joey, who is Willie, and what is the trouble?"

There was something in the look of the stout gentleman's face, and a homely kindness about his eyes that opened Joey's lips and unloosed the fountains of her heart, and within a few minutes, piece by piece, the long bitter history came out, and Joey for the first time had made a confidant of everything in the stout gentleman. When it was all said, and the step of the apothecary was heard upon the stairs returning, the stout gentleman took her hand, and said:

"Well, Joey, you must keep a good heart. There is no past so unhappy but there may be some compensation found for it. You must stay here now until I can find a better home for you, and we must have Willie looked up. I'd take you home with me now, Joey, but I never do anything of consequence without asking my wife or telling her of it, and so you will stay here and make the best home you can until I can do better for you. Yes! yes! we must find Willie! We will find Willie."

And the stout gentleman bustled about the room, looking into corners, and upon shelves, as though he expected to find the object of his search the instant, while Joey followed him about with her heavy feverish eyes, scarcely comprehending the change an hour had wrought in her condition. Only a dim, terrible remorse shot through her brain when she thought of her child, and of the chance that she might never see it again, and now within the very hour that such fearful thoughts had flashed across her fate had brought to her a friend and a home, that would not have been denied even with the burden of her child. How swift was retribution, and how terrible?

But at last the stout gentleman bustled away, after consigning Joey into the hands of the apothecary's wife, who came into the little office with a virtuous frown all over her face, which melted away like mist before Joey's childlike, helpless glance, and gave place in a moment to a fussily expressed desire to coddle and nurse the white-faced little patient. The stout gentleman had given a heavy plurality of orders and directions, all tending to the one grand point, which was that Joey was to be "fetched round" as quick as possible, and that he would drop in next day and see them, thrusting, as he left the shop, a card, on which was written the name of "Nettleton Driggs," into the hand of the apothecary, and bidding Joey a cheery "good-bye," went out, nodding back with a smile through the sash-window of the door.

How strange it seemed to her, who, but an hour or two before, had been a homeless wanderer upon the street, with no prospect before her but a pauper resting-place, to find herself at once the care of strangers, and with a home, even though only one for the moment. When she was removed upstairs, and too weak to move about, was seated in a great rocking-chair looking out upon the busy street and the crowds of which she had but a short time before made one, and heard the buzz, the clatter and the shouting, she felt as though all that had passed was but a dream, and that she should turn her head and see once more her dim and poverty-stricken room, and her child in its box-cradle, sleeping soundly in the corner. And then, each time as the dream would reach its culmination, she would gaze with a quick stare around the cosy apartment, and with a heart-sickening the fearful truth would all come back upon her, and her eye would wander away off into the extreme distance over the sea of heads, as though through dust and sun glare she could see the tiny form of the child she had that morning relinquished to the crowd, and hear its weak call for her protection.

And then next day came Mr. Nettleton Driggs and his wife, a stout, goodhumored, unremarkable lady of forty, who said little, but nodded assent and admiration to everything said by her husband, and shook hands with Joey, and asked her how she had been, as though she was an old acquaintance, and had turned up that day after an absence of a few months. Then she entered approvingly into all the suggestions of Mr. D——, relative to the domestication of Joey, and interspersed them with observations of her own as to the necessity of airing beds, and being particular that sheets were not damp, also some learned comments upon stuffing poultry and making custards, and an entire disagreement with the apothecary's wife upon a matter connected with the putting up of peach preserves, which ended in each lady declaring her intention of making a convert of the other by sending a jar of the article that they might become acquainted with the true method. To all this Joey listened with her heart's eyes gazing out to unknown places after the little one afloat upon the world, and of whom, up to this time, Mr. Nettleton Driggs had been able to get no intelligence, though the police were now on the search, and would, without doubt, succeed. And then it was agreed among them—without Joey's opinion being asked—that the next day she would leave the apothecary's, and as soon as she had been properly "fetched round," assume the position of assistant housekeeper under the charge of Mrs. D——, and consider their house as a future home, and with this arrangement completed, the worthy couple took their departure.

The next day Joey was transferred to Second avenue in a neat little pony chaise, the equine material of which bore striking resemblance, in sleekness and goodhumor, to their driver, Mr. Nettleton Driggs, who insisted that Joey was not sufficiently "fetched round" to walk the little distance to her new home. Here she was inducted into a large, comfortable, old-style house, with everything as neat as a pin, and the ancient furniture standing for a warrant of respectability, and rather improving by age and good-keeping. There was a great lazy cat with a silver collar, and a small lazy dog with another, moving stolidly about, and showing by their countenances as they followed their mistress into the sitting-room that they were too well-assured of their positions to feel jealousy of any new comer.

A tidy, bright-looking girl opened the door with a smile as the master entered, followed by Joey, and a quiet, middle-aged man-servant crossed the hall and went below. Everything in and about the house spoke of wealth without show, and solid, quiet comfort. To Joey all this was like entering upon fairy land, and the very aroma of the new home sent a balm to the inner heart of the poor, dejected, heart-stricken woman. Only one thing was wanting—only one thing!

Three more years, years full with outward peace and unvarying plenty, years in which there was wanting but one thing to make them years of entire happiness, had passed over Joey. Once more, as in the olden time in the Leroy household, Joey bore the middle relation between the trusted servitor and the child of the house. None among all the servants or among the guests but loved or admired the fair-faced, sad-eyed, girl-like woman, who moved so silently about her duties, and who had made her earnest and ministering hand so felt in her new home that the wonder only was how they ever got along before without her. Who but Joey took from the not unwilling-to-be-relieved hands of Mrs. D. the parts of household duty that could not be trusted to servants? Who but she became so skilled in the mysteries of pickles and pastry, preserves, stuffing and stews, that her proficiency met even the approbation of Mr. Nettleton Driggs, who had never before been able to find any hand, save that of his fair spouse, approach anywhere near the mark? Who but Joey could go into the markets and stores, and buy, with a close eye to quality and price, and render an account of her stewardship with a correctness that never showed a variation of a penny on the auditing of the account? And who during this three years received two distinct offers, one personally from the corner grocer, a smart and good-looking fellow of thirty, with ten thousand dollars of his own and a flourishing business, and who was stricken for a month by his rejection; and one from a wealthy tailor, retired from business to his country seat, forwarded through Mr. Nettleton Driggs, and endorsed by that gentleman as "a most responsible man, and the makings of an excellent husband," who also met with a like fate at Joey's hands, and, trusting his heart to the rebound, was caught, within a week or two after, by a gay and fashionable widow, who rewarded the bestowal of his plebeian hand by introducing the retired tailor into society? And during all these three years there was but one thing—that, in spite of every effort, no trace had been got to the little one who had strolled away into the great world upon that day when Joey first met Mr. Nettleton Driggs. Had that gentleman been searching for the philosopher's stone, with full faith in its verity, he could not have searched more truly and thoroughly than he did. All that the police could do, all that the newspapers could do, and all that his own faithfully working brain could do, was done, and at last, month by month, and year by year, the memory of the little one who had gone from her side so terribly on that day became only as a dim nightmare of a loved child in its little, coarse pink dress, cast out upon the sea and floating into the far distance, perhaps to death.

THE REV. DR. POTTS.

The Rev. George Potts, D. D., a distinguished Presbyterian clergyman of this city, died at his residence on the morning of Sept. 15, from the effects of a paralytic stroke received this summer at Saratoga. He was born at Philadelphia, was educated at and graduated from Princeton College, and immediately after his ordination became pastor of a Presbyterian church in Natchez, Mississippi, remaining in that position 15 years. He subsequently came to New York and assumed pastoral charge of the Duane street Presbyterian church. In 1846 his members erected a spacious church in University place, where he has since ministered with continued acceptability to a large and influential congregation. Dr. Potts has enjoyed almost a worldwide reputation ever since his celebrated controversy with Rev. Dr. Wainwright, of the Episcopal church, as to whether the church could exist without a bishop, a discussion which grew out of the virtual vacancy in the Episcopal church of this diocese in consequence of the Onderdonk scandal. Dr. Potts leaves a wife and four children—three sons and a daughter. One of the sons is in the Union army, another is a missionary in China, and the third is now preparing for the profession of which his father was so distinguished a member.

THE RAILWAY POST-OFFICE CAR.

Time is one of the most important public necessities of this busy age, and to save a few hours inventions of every description have been resorted to. One of the latest of these labor-saving, money-saving and time-saving contrivances which has been brought out in this country is the Railway Post-Office Car. It has been in use in England for several years, where its success has been eagerly watched. Having proved to be of great benefit, its introduction into this country was carefully considered, and, after several fruitless attempts, it has finally been adopted.

The credit of its introduction here belongs to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Alexander N. Zevely, and to Mr. Thomas Clark, Superintendent of the Newspaper Department of the New York Post-Office. Several improvements over the English system for transmitting the mails have been made by these gentlemen.

The cars are running between this city and Washington. One car leaves Washington at 5:20 in the evening, and reaches Jersey City at 6 o'clock on the following morning. The car going to Washington leaves Jersey City at 7:30 in the evening, and arrives at 6 o'clock the next morning.

Both cars meet at Philadelphia. When they arrive the clerks in charge of the New York car take the Washington car and return to this city in charge of the mail. The same routine movement is pursued by the Washington clerks. All the mails are assorted and prepared ready for delivery while the train is moving. When the car reaches New York the letters are boxed up and ready for distribution to all parts of the country, thus saving four hours' time on the city delivery alone, and in some of the country stations as much as 36 hours. Although the Southern mail will not close much if any earlier by this change, yet by taking letters to the car at the railroad depot they can be dropped into the mail up to within five minutes of the train's starting. By this arrangement letters can be sent South two hours later than heretofore. An extra car is stationed at New York in case of accident.

The clerks on the New York car as as follows: Thos. H. Jenkins, City Department; Joseph Elliott, Carriers Department; Edward Brennan, Erie Distributing Department; E. L. Champlin, East Distributing Department.

If the new cars were running on the Eastern route the mail matter for that direction would not be brought to the city office, thus frequently missing the trains in consequence of the time required to assort it, but would go at once to the Eastern cars.

The matter for the North, which goes on the Hudson river train, and for the West, which is forwarded by the Erie railroad, was taken charge of by two other men, and prepared in the same manner as has already been described with reference to the matter for the East.

The distribution for this city included the morning letters which came not only from the cities on the Washington route but from all points connecting with those cities.

The letters were so separated that those for the boxes of the Post-Office, according to the "sections" into which the five or six thousand boxes are divided, could be distributed at once at this office; that the letters for the callers at the "general delivery" box could be made ready immediately, and that the letters for the carriers and for the "stations" in this city should be given out on the arrival of the train here.

This early delivery is one of the first of the effects of the new system; and our citizens who desire to send letters southward at a late hour in the evening can do so when the train starts from Jersey City, at half-past 7 o'clock.

The cars contain every convenience which has been thought necessary for a thorough performance of the work. Besides the several hundred "pigeon-holes," into which the mail matter is distributed—these pigeon-holes covering a space nearly equal to one side of the car—there is sufficient room for the mails, the tables required by the clerks, and for working space.

We are indebted to Mr. Barker, Master of Transportation, New Jersey Railroad, for courtesies extended to our artist.

DESTRUCTION OF THE NEW YORK STATE INEBRIATE ASYLUM.

This noble institution, the first in the world devoted to the cure of a misery that sweeps off its thousands, has just received a serious injury by fire, the destructive element reducing to ruins the north wing and much of the centre.

The asylum, due to the energy and humanity of Dr. J. E. Turner, was founded in 1858, the corner-stone having been laid on the 24th of September, at Binghampton, in the presence of a large assemblage.

It was 365 feet long, three storeys high, of a castellated Gothic style, with massive towers, and constituting a noble and imposing structure.

Its beneficial results are unquestioned, and its loss would be a serious injury to the community.

On the 16th of September, while most of the inmates were at tea in the south section, a fire broke out in the north-west corner of the building, and on the top floor. The fire was seen by persons in the village almost as soon as it commenced, and the fire department promptly started for the scene of action. As soon as the engines were on the ground, it became apparent they were useless, there being no sufficient amount of water nearer than the river, and the distance and elevation preventing a supply from being obtained from that quarter. Many people had arrived on the ground by this time. To check the fire water was needed, and with a limited supply of pails the work of bringing the needed article from a well and cistern some distance from the building was commenced, and for two hours a train of buckets and pails was continually kept up by those willing to thus practically show their desire to stay the destruction of property.

In this way the men were kept busy fighting the progress of the fire, the point aimed at being to hold the fire in the north section, preventing its entering the centre of the building, and especially keeping it from reaching the south section or most valuable portion of the building. The struggle to check the flames commenced a little before seven, and by half-past eight it was evident that the fire was under control. A feeling of relief was manifested by half-past eight, as it became known that the building was not to be entirely destroyed, and by nine o'clock the people began to disperse.

The flames leave the south section of the asylum uninjured, while the centre is damaged only on the north side, the flames reaching it somewhat, but more of it being torn out and cut away to check the flames. The conservatories remain uninjured, excepting a few places where the fire caught and was extinguished, and the breaking of a few panes of glass. The south section of the building is somewhat damaged by being stripped of its movables and fixtures. The north section was burned clean of its woodwork, and the two inner walls are bowing, one of them leaning badly. The outer walls are somewhat blackened, and near the doors and windows so heated as to cause the stone to be more or less scaled.

Dr. Turner, who has charge of the asylum, was not at home, having left the day before to join his family in Connecticut. The loss is some $80,000 or $100,000.

THE PNEUMATIC RAILWAY

In the Grounds of the Crystal Palace, London.

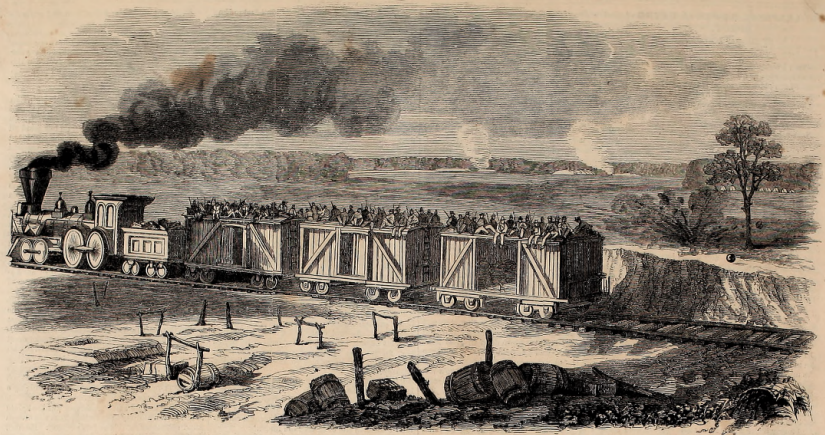
Several attempts have been made to drive railway cars by pneumatic pressure, hitherto with but indifferent success. There is now in operation, in the grounds of the Crystal Palace, London, however, a working model of one invented by T. W. Rammell, C.E., which seems to contain elements of success. It extends from the Sydenham entrance to the Armory, near the Penge gate, the distance of about one-third of a mile. Our illustration will enable our readers to understand the operation of this curious road.

A brickwork tunnel, about ten feet high by nine feet wide, and capable of admitting very large cars, is laid with a single track, fitted with opening and closing valves at each end, and supplied with apparatus for propelling a train by a strong draught behind, when it goes one way, and by pumping the air away in front when it goes the other.

The motive power is supplied by this contrivance: At the departure-station a large fan-wheel, with an iron disc, concave in surface, and 22 feet in diameter, is made to revolve by the aid of a small stationary engine, at such speed as may be required, the pressure of the air increasing, of course, according to the rapidity of the revolutions, and thus generating the force necessary to send the heavy carriage up a steeper incline than is to be found upon any existing railway. The disc gyrates in an iron case resembling that of a huge paddlewheel, and from its broad periphery the particles of air stream off in strong currents.

When driving the air into the upper end of the tunnel to propel the down train, fresh quantities rush to the surface of the disc to supply the partial vacuum thus created; and, on the other hand, when the disc is exhausting the air in the tunnel, with the view of drawing back the up-train, the air rushes out in a perfect hurricane from the escape valves of the disc case.

When the down journey is to be performed the breaks are taken off the wheels and the carriage moves by its own momentum into the mouth of the tube, passing in its course over a deep air-well in the floor, covered with an iron grating. Up this opening a gust of wind is sent by the disc, when a valve, formed by a pair of iron doors, hung like lock-gates, immediately closes firmly over the entrance of the tunnel, confining the increasing atmospheric pressure between the valve and the rear of the carriage. The force being thus brought to bear upon the end of the train, the latter, shut up within the tube, glides smoothly along towards its destination, the revolving disc keeping up the motive power until it reaches the steep incline, whence its own momentum again suffices to carry it the rest of the distance.



The return journey, on the contrary, is effected by the aid of the exhausting process. At a given signal a valve is opened, and the disc-wheel set to work in withdrawing the air from the tube. Near the upper end of the tube there is a large aperture, or side-vault, which forms the throat through which the air is exhaled, the iron doors at the terminus still being kept shut. In a second or two the train posted at the lower terminus, yielding to the exhausting process going on in its front, and urged by the ordinary pressure of the atmosphere from behind, moves off on its upward journey; and, rapidly ascending the incline, approaches the iron gates, which fly open to receive it, and it emerges at once into daylight.

Instead of a train being used at Sydenham, there is one very long, roomy and comfortable carriage, resembling an elongated omnibus, and capable of accommodating some 30 or 35 passengers. Passengers enter this carriage at each end, and the entrances are closed with sliding glass-doors. Fixed behind the carriage there is a framework of the same form, and nearly the same dimensions, as the sectional area of the tunnel, and attached to the outer edge of this frame is a fringe of bristle, forming a thick brush. As the carriage moves along through the tunnel the brush comes in close contact with the arched brickwork, so as to prevent the escape of the air. With this elastic collar round it, the carriage forms a close-fitting piston, against which the propulsive force is directed.

Although the curve of the tunnel is unusually sharp, being of eight chains radius, and the gradients are as high as 1 in 15 (those of Holborn Hill being only 1 in 18), it is surprising that the motion is much steadier and pleasanter than ordinary railway travelling. The journey of 600 yards is performed, either way, in about 50 seconds, with an atmospheric pressure of only two ounces and a half to the square inch; but a higher rate of speed, if desirable, can easily be obtained.

GRANT'S RAILROAD—THE REBELS SHELLING THE TRAIN AT THE EXPOSED POINT FROM CEMETERY HILL.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, JOSEPH BECKER.

GRANT'S RAILROAD.

We follow up the interesting sketches of Grant's railroad last week by two which need some explanation. At one point the road is very much exposed and the cars are certain to be saluted by shells from a rebel battery. Our Special Artist sketches this path of danger, and also shows how Gen. Grant is providing a remedy by throwing up works to protect the passing trains. Although the rebels shell constantly no serious injury has been done, and yet the missiles fall around and strike quite near. In one case a keg of spikes was struck and the contents sent in a most dangerous manner for a considerable distance in all directions.

ANCIENT HOUSE ON THE FAIRFAX ESTATE, NOW OWNED BY MR. DENNY.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, J. E. TAYLOR.

ANCIENT HOUSE ON The Fairfax Estate.

The Fairfax estate, confiscated at the Revolution for the loyalty of its possessor, Lord Fairfax, the friend of Washington in youth, was one of immense size and value. It comprised nearly the whole of 17 modern Virginia counties, and has been the theatre of most of the battles fought in the present war between the Potomac and the Rapidan. When its owner heard of the surrender of Cornwallis he called his body servant: "Come, James, take me to bed, it is time for me to die." Memorials of its ancient lordly proprietor still remain, and our Artist has sketched one ancient house with its curious dovecote near at hand. This antique dwelling is now owned by Mr. Denny, a good Union man.

A new method of depriving gold ores of sulphur has been introduced at the mines of Pike's Peak. It consists in reducing the ores to fine dust, then forcing the dust by a draft through a flame of pine wood.

THE LEAFLESS BOWER—A RETROSPECT.

BY THOMAS POWELL.

I.

WHEN I was young—oh, blissful When,
I was as glad as other men;
Now I am old—ah, woeful Now,
A weight of sorrow girds my brow—
The thorns of memory pierce my brain!
Ah, vanished joys, ye give the pain—
The presence of the silent Past
Makes the dim Future dark and ghast.

II.

How from their hallowed tombs arise
The forms long shrouded from our eyes:
The father, who toiled life away,
And she who taught us first to pray—
Sisters and brothers, loving band,
Once more in thought around me stand—
But dearer far the tender wife,
Who sweetened all our daily life,
And gently helped us to sustain
The wearied heart and jaded brain—
Whose smile was light, and whose pure kiss
Emparadised a world of bliss;
And lounging on her loving knee
A little prattling child I see—
All sleep where I ere long shall rest,
The deep grave's uncomplaining guest.

III.

Oh, that the past for one brief hour
Could bring them to the leafless bower,
In which I drowse away the time
In mournful dreams or joyless rhyme—
As mid the boughs, so black and sear,
The moans of perished hopes I hear—
Sepulchral voices heard among
Bare ruined choirs where birds once sung!
That I might speak the unspoken weight
Of love that makes me desolate—
And unsay bitter words once said
In anger to the injured dead—
That I might gain one smile, and hear
Once more those tones, now doubly dear—
'Tis only when the loved are gone
We know what 'tis to be alone.

IV.

'Tis vain—'tis vain—the dead are dumb—
They cannot to my longing come,
But I shall go to them—God speed
The hour when living men shall read
The silent stone above my head
Which tells I slumber with the dead.

NINA MARSH;

OR,

THE SECRET OF THE MANOR.

CHAPTER XV.—THE MISSING MAGNET—ATTRACTION ABSENT.

IT was close upon five o'clock the next day when Mr. and Mrs. Mervyn arrived at Beechwood Manor. It was already dark, and the old House with its brilliant windows threw a hundred reflections out upon the snow. The hall, with its huge red lamp and blazing log fire, looked cheerful and comfortable to the weary travellers. Miss Mervyn rubbed her dazzled eyes and glanced about her. She was apt to sentimentalise in all weathers and on all occasions; it was almost her only fault. In this case most people would have warmed themselves first, and kept their transports for future discussion. But Miss Mervyn was so constituted that this was impossible to her.

"Dear me!" she exclaimed, regarding the oak settle with eyes of almost tearful tenderness, "how many, many happy days I have passed here!"

"Not in the hall, my dear, surely?" said her brother, who, though tolerably virtuous, was intolerably matter-of-fact.

"So very many happy days!" continued Miss Mervyn, not heeding his interruption, and straying into soliloquy for want of appreciation. "But one can't be always young and gay; the time will pass."

"That's rather a trite aphorism, Selina, my dear."

"So it is, Anthony, I know," replied his sister, with perfect gentleness; "but it is one a woman of my age gets into the habit of repeating, fancying that, because it is so true, it must needs be new also."

But Mr. Mervyn had given his attention to the butler, who was carefully helping him off with his great coat.

"Thank you, thank you; my painful infirmity renders me peculiarly indebted to any one for some small assistance of this kind. Selina, my dear, if you are ready, we will proceed towards the drawing-room by small stages. Mr. Marsh knows how I am situated with regard to my unfortunately feeble legs, and will, therefore, make every excuse for our delay. Thank you, Simmons, if you will have the goodness to precede us, only gently, if you please."

But at this moment Mr. Marsh came downstairs to welcome his guests and conduct them to his wife. Miss Mervyn looked at him with eyes of earnest interrogation. The last time she had been at Beechwood, she remembered so well that Nina had been waiting for her in the hall, not allowing any one but her herself to remove her travelling cloak, and warming her cheeks and her heart both with her glad impulsive kisses. And now it was so different. Had Nina ceased to care for her old friend? The very suspicion turned all Miss Mervyn's pleasure into pain. Mr. Marsh's cordial greetings left no sense of satisfaction behind. A chill had come over her, all the stronger that this visit had created such pleasant anticipation beforehand, and appeared to offer itself as a solution of so many doubts and fears. Nina must be away from home, she felt sure. Had she been at Beechwood she must certainly have come to welcome her earlier, if only for the sake of keeping the contrast between her past and present feelings from the eyes of the servants. Indeed, so convinced did Miss Mervyn feel of Nina's absence, that she never even made a question of her presentiment, but quietly resigned herself to circumstances.

"Nina is gone," said Mrs. Marsh, after she had kissed Miss Mervyn, and made her very welcome to the house and the fireside.

"Yes, I see," answered the other, with a low sigh and pained, disappointed look.

Mrs. Marsh said no more after this, and was glad to be saved the effort. It seemed to her, from Miss Mervyn's manner and words, that there had really been some misunderstanding between the two, and she thought by probing the wound in the dark she should rather hurt than heal. So she busied herself in making every arrangement for Miss Mervyn's comfort without speaking another word in reference to Nina's departure.

Still, in this case, more than in any other, Nina had been Miss Mervyn's special attraction at Beechwood, and all the kindness shown her by the others could not compensate to her for the lack of those attentions she had been accustomed to receive from Nina. She tried to appear happy; she even carried her magnanimity so far as to inwardly declare that Nina was quite right not to deny herself an agreeable visit for the sake of a tiresome old woman's company; she went further still, and tried to believe that she had in some way provoked this desertion; but still down deep in Miss Mervyn's heart there was a certain sense of ill-usage which she would not acknowledge, just as there had been at the time of Colonel St. George's ungracious avoidance of explanations she so ardently desired.

Three days of Miss Mervyn's visit had already passed, and still she heard nothing of Nina's whereabouts. By tacit consent her name was avoided in the household. Mr. Marsh was displeased with her, and Mrs. Marsh, although her heart still yearned towards her favorite daughter, scarcely dared speak of her, lest the habit of unreserved confidence should tempt her into the divulging some of her own miserable doubts and fears. Katie pined after her, and the more, too, that some instinct taught her she would be wise to keep this feeling to herself. Katie appeared to be somewhat stronger just now, although not radically better. Captain Marsh had proposed that she should learn to ride, thinking that the exercise might be beneficial to her; and every day he might be seen, when the sun was warm and bright, leading her pony up and down the terrace, and making it very pleasant to Katie by his cheerful words and careful tending. Somehow or other, Katie never thought to thank him on these occasions. She seemed to divine instinctively that he was pleasuring himself as well as her; and that, even if he could have thought of any reward, her warm affection and clinging dependence would have satisfied him on every point.

Meanwhile, Mr. Marsh was not so agreeably employed. Mr. Mervyn was one of those men whom conscientious relatives should never allow to make visits. Although perfectly harmless and well-meaning, it was wonderful how much disturbance he created in a household, and how difficult he was to amuse. Mr. Marsh resigned all his favorite employments, and gave himself up to a species of martyrdom, and yet Mr. Mervyn looked inexpressibly and affably bored. He could not walk; he did not care to drive; the very suggestion of riding filled him with reproachful dismay; he was no reader, looking with indifference even on the Times; when, therefore, he had turned his thumbs from right to left all the morning, and made everybody in the room feel idle and uncomfortable, he had only to repeat the operation in the reverse direction through the afternoon.

Assuredly, Mrs. Mervyn, mère, had made a great mistake in bringing him into the world at all, for what good he did in it no one could possibly tell. This was not our opinion originally; it is only right to specify that it was pirated from the servant's hall, where Mr. Mervyn was not regarded in a favorable light.

"What's the good of his being born? he doesn't do no good to anybody," said Miss Wells to Jim, the under groom. "It's my belief he worrits master's seven senses out of him with his nasty womanish ways. He can't do this, and he won't do that, and he must have this, and he mustn't have that; and I declare if he just steps outside the door he must be wrapped up in three great coats and two comforters. I'm sure I wonder he doesn't have himself lined inside with fur; he's finikin enough for that any day!"

"Well," said Jim, in reply, "I don't like to see gentlemen coddle themselves so, I must say. If he's made of crockery, and is afeard of breaking, what makes him pay visits?"

"That's my opinion. People who are so pitiful when they are out should stay at home. I know what I'd do if I was master."

"Well, what?"

"I wouldn't invite him. But I played him a pretty trick the night before last, and no mistake," added Eliza, with a little glow of triumph. "He won't be so disagreeable for some time to come, it strikes me."

"What did you do?"

"Well, you must know he has been complaining every day how bad his bed was made; 'it wasn't shook enough,' he said; 'there was lumps in it as big as your fist, and as to sleeping in it, and so on, he couldn't think of such a thing.' Well, last night he rings the bell quite late, and when Mr. Simmons answered it he says, imperious like:

"'Send up the girl who makes my bed.'

"So up I goes, and there stands my lord fretting and fuming, with the counterpane on the floor, and his room in the biggest mess you ever saw.

"'Mary Ann,' says he.

"'My name's Miss Wells, commonly called Eliza,' says I, rather short, for I didn't feel in the best of tempers.

"'Well, Eliza,' says he, 'is that what you call a Christian bed?'

"'It was, sir,' says I, 'before you slept in it, I know, but I can't tell what it may be now.'

"'Don't be impudent, young woman,' he makes answer, 'or I shall hinform your mistress. Now look here. There's ice on the ground an inch thick, and we are in the middle of February, and yet upon my word, you consider three blankets—only three, mind—a proper proportion for a delicate man. I ask you, young woman, a simple question, and I beg that you will answer it according to your conscience.'

"'Well, but you haven't asked me any question yet,' says I.

"'Yes I have—don't prevaricate, young woman,' says he; 'I inquired if three blankets were sufficient for a delicate man when it's the middle of February and ice on the ground an inch thick?'

"'I'm not accustomed to see to delicate men. I didn't know their ways was so different to other people's; but, if you want more blankets, I can get you some out of the store-room,' says I.

"'Not to-night; I will endure the hardship for this once,' says he; but, mind me, if I catch a severe cold, and am laid up, you will be bound to pay my doctor's bill.'

"'I wish you may get well on the money you screw out of me,' thinks I as I goes downstairs.

"Well, yesterday morning, when I made his bed, I got ten blankets out of the store-room—all there was left—and crammed them on his bed without saying anything to anybody. He didn't ring for me last night, but when he came down this morning I happened to meet him in the passage.

"'Eliza, you miserable young woman,' he says, looking as if he was all in a tremble, 'what did you do to my bed last night? I haven't closed my eyes. I was in a perfect fever, and was so consumed with thirst that I drank the whole carafe-full of water in the course of the night.'

"'Dear me, sir, do you think you've got the scarlet fever?' says I, looking very innocent; 'I know it's pretty much about, and lots of people have died of it.'

"'Oh, Eliza! as you value my peace of mind, don't say that! it's my peculiar horror. I couldn't survive it! I've no stamina, and my unfortunate peculiarity—'

"'Well, sir, it is very unfortunate, when you are out upon a visit, too.'

"'But you're quite sure it wasn't your fault, Eliza? Did you make the bed properly?'

"'I shook it up well, sir.'

"'And how many blankets did you put on?'

"'Only thirteen, sir.'

"'Only thirteen! then that accounts for it! I wonder I'm not dead, I'm sure! Thirteen blankets! Mercy, mercy me!'

"And he went off, too thunderstruck to grumble; but it's a pity if I haven't given him a lesson."

"Well, Eliza, I will say one thing for you—you are a girl of pluck, and no mistake!" exclaimed Jim, admiringly. "If you have got some savings, and have a mind to settle, I'll take you, and willing."

"And what about the public?" said Eliza, taking care not to deny the soft impeachment with reference to savings.

"Hang the public!" said Jim.

"You'd better cut it," answered Eliza, meaningly.

"Well, I don't mind which it is," replied Jim, who was naturally of an accommodating disposition.

"But you'll have to take to minding that, and more things besides, if you want me."

And then Miss Wells went off to her duties, feeling that she had profited by her opportunities as well as could be expected.

Mr. and Miss Mervyn had originally decided to remain a week at Beechwood, but on the morning in which the conversation recorded above took place between the under housemaid and the lower groom, Mr. Mervyn went to his sister, and expressed his intention of leaving the next day.

"You know, Selina, you can do as you like, but I am quite determined to be out of this house by to-morrow evening."

"But, my dear Anthony, what is the matter?" said Miss Mervyn, speaking rather hurriedly, perhaps, in surprise.

"Don't be so impulsive, Selina!" exclaimed her brother, reproachfully; "you know how weak my nerves are, and what a shattered constitution mine is. I require the greatest care and quiet, besides unremitting attention. I am not fit to pay visits."

Miss Mervyn certainly could have indorsed his last sentiment with all cordiality had she felt so inclined.

"And, my dear," he went on, "I understand that scarlet fever is raging in the neighborhood, and you know it is my especial horror. I should be sure to catch it. Last night I was consumed with fever, and that miserable girl who attends to my room put thirteen—actually thirteen—blankets on my bed."

"Then no wonder you were consumed with fever."

"Selina, oblige me by not discussing any medical questions; you do not understand them, and you know that I have always been painfully averse to anything like an argument."

"My dear Anthony, I had no intention of arguing—the matter is so clear."

"Oblige me, Selina"—and here Mr. Mervyn put up both his hands in solemn deprecation. "Chirurgery is out of a woman's province altogether, indeed it is."

"Then you certainly leave to-morrow?" said his sister, by way of turning the conversation.

"Selina!" exclaimed Mr. Mervyn, looking completely outraged, "when did you ever know me to break my word? I did not understand that you had quite decided."

"I am not of a vacillating, erratic temperament, as you must be convinced. What I have once said I hold by. At the same time, although your natural guardian and responsible protector in the eyes of the law, I lay no commands on you. Do exactly as you feel inclined."

"If you go, I may as well go too."

And then Miss Mervyn gave a little sigh. In spite of all the kindness and consideration shown her, her visit had not been a pleasant one. Nina's unexplained absence had weighed on her mind all through. This young friend, whom she had loved with all the affection of her warm, weak, trustful heart, had rejected her love, and gone away, probably, that they might not meet. And, thinking on these things, Miss Mervyn not only sighed, but allowed herself to believe that she should be more comfortable altogether when away from Beechwood.

When this question was settled, Miss Mervyn went straight to Mrs. Marsh to acquaint her with her intention. Mrs. Marsh remonstrated, but rather feebly, perhaps. She had been living in constant dread lest Miss Mervyn should learn Nina's near neighborhood, and either express a wish to see her or demand the reason of her absence. It was, therefore, with a certain sense of relief leavening her actual regret that Mrs. Marsh heard of her friend's intention of leaving on the morrow. Lord Gillingham was to dine at the Manor House that evening. Mr. Marsh had met him in the road just after breakfast, and his lordship had managed to make it plainly understood that he should like to be invited, and so Mr. Marsh had invited him. But it is not clear to us that Mr. Marsh was not guilty of deception when he refrained from telling the earl that Nina would not be there, since to see her could be his lordship's only object in seeking this invitation.

Lord Gillingham had learnt enough of the habits of Mr. Marsh's family to know that Nina was always first in the drawing-room of an evening. He had, therefore, calculated upon ten precious minutes alone with her before the others should assemble. He would speak out plainly then. She would be seated in an armchair, he should be standing over her, watching the clear bloom mount to her soft cheeks, and the silken eyelashes fall over the deep gray eyes. Presently he should take the little tremulous hand in his own, and then the earl reflected that it might even be pleasant to kneel down beside her and catch a new phase of her most glorious beauty. And then he should kiss her, of course—a kiss of betrothal, as was his right; and the earl, in his villainous heart, gloated over the thought of touching the pure young red of those sweet lips. Lord Gillingham, midway in his evil career, began to think a virtuous passion not only possible, but actually stimulating.

He was drawing this pretty picture, dreaming this pleasant dream, all the way to Beechwood. He was in high good-humor when he alighted from his horse.

"Here, Pierce, he said to the groom who had followed him, "take this sovereign and buy a ribbon for your sweetheart."

Pierce touched his hat with one hand and pocketed the coin with the other.

"Let Mary know that you've orders to be here at ten o'clock, and that she mustn't keep you a minute beyond, or no more ribbons, eh, Pierce?"

And then his lordship entered the house.

He was shown into the house, and waited there with exemplary patience full ten minutes. Then Mrs. Marsh came in, looking as if she had been slightly hurried over her toilette. Lord Gillingham greeted her almost eagerly, for he was growing tired of solitude, and was, besides, anxious to ascertain why Nina had departed from her usual habit. He mentioned her name, inquiring tenderly after her health.

"Thank you, she was quite well when she left us," said Mrs. Marsh; "but I have not heard from her since she went."

"Miss Nina, then, is away?"

"She is staying a few days with Miss Dawes."

"With Miss Dawes? I had no idea there was any particular friendship between them."

"I don't think there is; only they have been near neighbors since childhood."

"I hope, then, Mr. Dawes isn't Nina's attraction at Gladshelles?"

Mrs. Marsh—a lady every inch of her—looked up perfectly astonished at the earl's impertinence. I really think his lordship felt a little ashamed as he met the clear, contemptuous glance of those beautiful eyes. At any rate, he knew that he had made a mistake, and hastened to rectify it.

"This was a mere joke, of course," he added, in a tone of frank bonhomie. "No one could give Miss Nina credit for such arrant bad taste."

Mrs. Marsh thought that Nina would be guilty of far worse if she chose the earl, confident though he might be as to his own advantages. But he husband entered the room at this moment, and she turned away, only too glad to be spared the annoyance of entertaining such a disagreeable guest. The earl could not get over his disappointment. He was in one of his cynical, captious tempers all the evening, and, but for the tact of Captain Marsh and the quiet dignity of the old squire, would have broken out into absolute rudeness long before the ladies had retired. As it was, he and Mr. Mervyn launched little malicious shafts at each other across the dinner-table with visible aim and significance.

Just like all people who are conspicuously disagreeable in their peculiarities, Mr. Mervyn had a quick eye for the failings of others, and the smallest possible patience with them when discovered. He seemed to forget to-night that his nervous irritability might be as unpleasant in its effect upon others as the earl's cynicism was on him. He had discovered early in the evening that Lord Gillingham was very tenacious of his rank, although his conduct was so wanting in true nobility, and Mr. Mervyn became an obstinate democrat on the spot.

At last he capped the climax by forsaking his new principles in order to discover that there was no earl or marquis in the house to whom he would yield precedence in point of good blood, for that his family was the most ancient in all England.

"Do you know what you are talking about?" exclaimed the earl, turning upon him brutally, and glaring at him through his red, bleared eyes.

"I believe I may venture to assert that I do," answered Mr. Mervyn, in a tone of smooth confidence. "Mr. Debrett has told me that I never speak without due deliberation."

"Then, egad, sir, I tell you what—one hair of my head is better bred than your whole body."

"The seantiness of your lordship's hair takes a good deal from the force of the insult," said Mr. Mervyn, with an elaborate bow.

"Or rather the joke," put in Captain Marsh, pleasing himself between the combatants. "My lord, you will surely take another glass of hock? I have heard my uncle say that you prefer it to anything. Mr. Mervyn, I know your partiality for old port, and I think, my dear, there has been in the cellar, I believe, over twenty years. If neither of you will be persuaded to any further patronage of my uncle's wine, perhaps we had better join the ladies." Ducky, have I your permission to open the door?"

The gentlemen all rose at this; but, even when amongst the ladies once more, it required the happiest art on Captain Marsh's side, and the greatest care on that of Mr. Marsh, to keep the irascible old peer from another and still angrier dispute with the captious democrat, and it was greatly to the relief of all parties when Lord Gillingham rose and bade them good-night.

CHAPTER XVI.—JACK DAWES TURNS REFORMER.

MEANWHILE Nina was passing a really pleasant time at Gladesbelle. Her ashe had no part to play, and she might be herself—and herself was the gift that she could smile, and look melancholy when gaiety was impossible. Anna Dawes' prejudice against the invalid guest was somewhat diminished by intimacy. She did not wonder at Jack's partiality now; she could have wondered, indeed, knowing Jack as she did, that any man could not love her. Only Anna divined that whilst Jack's love and hope kept him from realising—Nina liked him greatly as a friend, but had no feeling beyond. She would have married Jack of this, only she thought such words would come best from Nina's lips, and softened by a tear in those beautiful eyes, might sound less hopeless and more cruel. Jack seemed resolved to tempt his fate. He lay on his bed of a night, restless and wakeful, trying to frame short sentences which should only express all he intended to say. He dared not trust himself with long phrases—he knew that he should break down. Jack was a man who daily exposed that it might be easy to manage it all by a few words. Only when he did really speak, it was strange how widely he diverged from the plan he had set down.

Nina was early in the drawing-room, as usual, that evening. Her simple toilette was always quaintly made; besides, a quiet half-hour in the dim light was growing pleasant to her again. But Jack had learnt her habits, and thought the opportunity an excellent one for his purpose.

"She will hear me murmuring, perhaps," thought Jack to himself, "but she won't see me blush, and I don't want to look like a coward after I've been at the pains of getting my pluck up for the occasion."

When Jack entered the room, Nina was seated on a low stool in front of the fire, dreaming. Jack just turned when she saw him, and smiled up into his face.

"You see I make myself quite at home."

"Do you, Miss Nina?" said Jack, feeling hopelessly uncertain as to the availability of his treasured resources.

"I hope you've been comfortable here, Miss Nina?" was Jack's next step towards his mighty revelation. "You can make herself pleasant when she likes now, can't she?"

"No one could have been kinder than Miss Dawes."

"And cheerful?"

"Very cheerful," answered Nina, confiding her smile of amusement to the fire alone.

"You would think it quite the house—I mean to live in—should you?" questioned Jack, displaying some anxiety as to the reply.

"Of course, dear me, no!"

"But it wouldn't be exactly what you would call amusing, Miss Nina?"

"If you are treated kindly in a place, it must be agreeable to you. One's happiness always depends upon people, not upon places."

"Do you think, then, do you think, Miss Nina?"

"Of course—with us, if not with ones."

"What about the oats?" said Jack.

And his tone was a little disappointed now, Nina thought, though why she could not comprehend.

"Don't they say that oats attach themselves to a locality, and not to the people in it?"

"Do they say? I never heard it; but you know best. You are so clever, Miss Nina—cleverer than Nan by a clear hand—and she's not a fool. But some boys seem to know everything—everything it's best to know, I mean—not Latin and all that stuff. It isn't any good learning Latin now, is it?"

"I don't know—everybody does; so perhaps it is better not to be behind the rest."

"You think so?"

And Jack was silent a minute or two, growing thoughtful as he turned his eyes upon the fire.

"Miss Nina," he said presently, "would it be any use my trying to get myself up in Latin now?"

"I don't think it would. Why, have you any ambition that way?"

"Well, I begin to fancy I've wasted my time sadly. I wish I'd stuck to my books when I was young. I suppose no one could care for a man who didn't know Latin?"

Jack spoke in a tone of helpless appeal that Nina's heart. It is sad when a man begins to feel his own deficiencies so acutely, and to mourn over the wasted opportunities it is now too late to redeem. She answered him very gently—

"I don't think men are really liked for those acquirements. It is advisable, we know, not to be behind others; and in the same time, I fancy that you would like a person you were going to like ever before you inquired whether he was a good scholar. One would be influenced by the kindness of disposition and heart he had, and when satisfied on this point, one would not so much care about learning and so on. Still, I do not mean to infer that talent and knowledge are not very valuable and certain advantages to their possessor; I only wish to make it understood that some other qualities are of more value than Latin, Jack."

"But it's not quite against anybody's being liked, not having talent, and all that sort of thing?"

"Not if they are good-hearted and well-principled."

"I wonder if I am?" said Jack, speaking to himself rather than to Nina. "What do people do when they are? I'm afraid I don't show many kindnesses to people, but that's because I don't want to—it's because I don't know how. I wish I could do more what was right. Somehow I always had the notion that if I took care of Nan, and made her comfortable, I hadn't much more to think about besides amusing myself. I'm afraid I got wrong at starting, and the worst of it is I don't know how to get right again."

"But the care and comfort of Miss Dawes were your first and greatest duties," said Nina, gently.

Jack started. He had hardly been sure that he was speaking aloud. He had been following out his thoughts without reference to Nina for the moment, and it seemed as if an encouragement to his hopes that his answer should have been vouchsafed. Jack was no metaphysician. His mind, what he did of it, was his pondrous and awkward for fine distinctions. He could be very far in front of him by reason of the dimness of his lights; but, to do him justice, he went steadily over every obstacle in the space allotted to his understanding.

There are more like Jack Dawes—ones who would be so sensible if only they knew how—ones who are always striving to do right, wondering where they can learn, and what stands in their way, and yet following their own devices, and blind to their own tendency, and making it quite unintelligible to mere lookers-on how their course of action can be so different to all they anxious wish after bitter things. It is like the man who Sisyphus was doomed to roll up the steep hill—their good intentions were always thrown back upon them again, and they had to make the effort at ascent in merely a rough fall. Maybe they will never land their burden safe beyond peril of renewed accidents, but we would fain hope that many a weak and dear interests than the man who yearns vaguely at times to reach the summit, but, frightened at the view of many struggles, falls back from the attempt, and, stifling his conscience, goes along the smooth path in undisturbed peace.

Jack's dawning consciousness of his failure and deeply opened-the eyes of his understanding. He began to realise now that his life had not been altogether as it ought to have been, and he longed to learn from the wisdom of others how he might do to redeem his past and make himself worthy of the view of angels.

"Yes, I know I ought to see to Nan first," he said, after a long pause: "but isn't there anything else for me to do? I don't go to church on Sundays—had to do so—I suppose. Though, Nan tells me so sometimes: but then she makes out I'm to do it for the sake of what people will say, and she look of the thing."

"I am afraid a great many regular attendants have no better reason to give, if they spoke the truth."

"I shall sell my hunters," said Jack, who was becoming a most enthusiastic reformer.

"But why? shouldn't if I were you."

"Don't you think I ought?"

"Certainly not."

"Then hadn't I better get rid of my dogs?"

"Why should you?"

"Mustn't I do something? Ah! I know. I'll give up going to fairs."

"There it would be advisable to reform."

"And races," added Jack, determined to stop at no sacrifice Nina considered necessary, although in him the task was disappointed and arduous.

"I am no fitting judge in such matters, and ought not, perhaps, to give you advice; but repentant and true hearts are essential to everybody, and, therefore, I think, you go to races as a mere looker-on, and do not bet, there is no reason why you should deny yourself this pleasure."

Jack's face brightened wonderfully.

"Do you think so, Miss Nina? I shouldn't mind about giving them up—at least, not so very much as you told me it was right."

"I am no judge in such matters, as I said before. I cannot see any harm in racing myself, without betting, but I might not still——"

"Somebody else might."

"A few do, I dare say."

"I only care about what you think in such matters," said Jack, significantly. "Some people are so squeamish, they call everything wrong. I want to do what is right, and go some way towards leading a better life; being dull isn't particularly Christianlike, as I can see. A prig isn't a saint. I don't care to make a show of being wiser, my wish is to do the real thing, Jack. Only you must show me how, Miss Nina: I can't go a step myself."

Nina had risen and stood against the mantelpiece, looking down into the fire.

"You mustn't ask advice of me," she said, with a look of sad humility. "I am not fit to give it. You can't be more painfully alive to your deficiencies than I am to mine."

"I always thought you were quite perfect, Miss Nina."

"I was? Ah, Mr. Dawes, you cannot tell how very, very far wrong you have been! Perhaps some of these days you will know all, and consider yourself agrieved that I should have asked to sleep under the same roof with your sister. But try to think of me a little kindly even then. You cannot tell how sore pressed I was, how tempted and weakened—and I was so young!"

Nina had sunk upon her knees, and was bending down until her face was almost touching the ground as she spoke. It seemed strange that she should choose such a confidant as Jack Dawes, but she had truly said that her miserable secret was eating into her very life. She could forget it for a few minutes, and she had even found it to be possible to appear cheerful, even when she did not feel so; but there were times when the vague yearning within her to tell of her sins and hear some voice say that they might be forgiven her. She knew of the greatness of mercy promised to all those who repent, but she could not believe that she was within the pale of those promises.

If any one had told her that she should seek this comfort from Jack Dawes, she would have scorned the idea with the utmost fervor; but now, as she knelt there before him, she longed to hear his words of pardon, and was in her anxiety in his earnestness and simplicity. She could not forfeit much by telling him her miserable secrets, and it would bring relief to herself. If he should despise her when all was told, she could but leave him, there was no such tie between them that her heart must break if she lost him. Another question; if he could think pardon possible for her, he should feel stronger. And Nina did tell Jack, pouring out her confession with vehement self-reproach as she bent low at his feet.

Jack listened gravely, incredulously at first, but no one could doubt the sincerity of a person who so humbly and strikingly accused herself so fatally. When she had finished, she buried her face in her hands, and awaited his first words as a prisoner awaiting the sentence of the judge.

Jack moved away, and paced the room a few moments with a stern, darkening face, from which Nina shrank, as from a frown at her first words. Presently he came back to where she stood and spoke to her, but his voice was not the cheery, pleasant voice of an hour ago.

"You have no more to say, Nina from me?"

"Nothing—can I be forgiven?" She uncovered her face again now, and gave him a look of anxious supplication.

He struggled a moment with something in him as—doubt, a fear, whatever it might be; then he took the hands that clasped her cold hands in his own, and said, passionately:

"I can forgive you, Nina, for I love you so blindly."

"Not now, Jack—you can't love me now."

"Yes, Nina, I love you now, I shall love you for ever. If Nan were away out of my home, I would still ask you to be my wife as it is—"

"You think I oughtn't to stop here?"

"How should I know? Oh, Nina! I can't see right, but I'll try—I'll try hard to be done. I'll tell you, for I love you so blindly. I could trust you now the same as ever. Oh, my darling! my darling! that you should have suffered so much! He broke off suddenly, and wrung his hands with hopeless sorrow.

"I can't bear beyond my strength," she answered, humbly, "and I have repented so earnestly since! Oh, do tell me, Jack, would not God forgive me?" It is so sad at nineteen to feel with out hope."

"Poor little one," said Jack, laying his huge hand tenderly over her bent head. "I don't understand much, but I can help, but I can't help thinking that, if you're sorry for what you've done, and didn't mean it to be as it was, God will forgive you."

"I am sorry, Jack, and I would willingly take all the shame if I might be spared that one great load. And you forgive me?"

"I know you have, poor darling"—and the great rough fellow spoke very softly from his tenderest heart—"I know you do. People can't do wrong without suffering for it, if they've got any heart; but it's just the suffering that washes out the sin, you know, in a way of thinking. I look upon you the same as if you had never told me this, and am as proud to have you here; but there's Nan to see, she was left to me in a queer sort of way, and I feel as if I ought to take more care of her than an ordinary brother would. If she day was over to come when she could turn to me with a confidence like yours, through no fault, and because I'd thought of my pleasure before her good, I believe I should die of shame. Nina, I'll tell you what I'll do—and when she was first trusted to me, and I've always had my fears that I shouldn't do what was right by her. But if Nan ever comes to me, and would come to like me a bit, I would do all I could to make you happy; and as to that thing ever being spoken of between us, I'll never mention it again; and then, if you could make up your mind to love me a little, I know I should be very happy, and I would make you so too if I could."

Jack never knew how much his earnest words added to Nina's sorrow and humiliation. There was something to her in having a quiet home and friends to love her, and the recollection of her secret could chill or destroy. For a minute she had thought it possible to cast aside her love for Cyril Marsh, and accept this life offered her, and be glad and grateful for this much of peace and comfort after the miserable struggles of the past year. And yet he who loved her so truly that in his heart he could forgive her her sins, and even respect her again, even he could not see that it was right to bring her under the same roof as his sister. Nina acknowledged the justice of his scruple and the sacredness of his trust, but never before where she had sought comfort had she found such a miserable answer to her prayer. She had no longer any hope, nor could she feel as if she had any right to the gifts and pardon even of the world, because Jack, whose instinct was his sole guide, had not bestowed his forgiveness upon her in unconditional terms. He loved her blindly—he said so—but not so blindly that he would cause Anna, whose name was pure and unstained, to make a sister by law and love of Nina Marsh.

"I know it is my own fault," she said to herself, "but oh! it is so hard to bear. I have looked upon upon Anna Dawes a little, perhaps, in times gone by, and now I seem to hear it said—and that by a man who loves me better than her—that I am not fit for her company—that I might contaminate her. And she was right to say that too. I cannot contradict him. I must ever respect him more for this fear. When everything comes out—and I suppose it must—he would be sadly blamed if he had allowed us to remain together, knowing my faults. Oh, my God, have pity on me! My strength is failing so short! I have suffered almost as much as I can suffer, and live."

A part of this cry, deepening, cry passed her lips in words, and went straight, like a sharp arrow, to Jack's honest, loving heart. He bent down again, folded his strong arms about her, and said, earnestly:

"Nina, I am sorry for what I said just now. I will protect you before and against all the world. Do you think you like me well enough to marry me?"

Nina shook her head, and the pent-up tears flowed fast on the broad breast against which she leaned.

"I like you too well to bring shame on you and your name," she said, with a resolute accent Jack recognised as final. "I will try for time to be able to remember you with affection, and if it can please you to think of me as a sister—one who sinned, suffered and repented—one who has tasted of such sorrow and bitterness that her youth was no pleasure to her, and she longed to be old and grayhearted before she had done anything to be a blessing of peace—then, Jack, you may believe in your kind, noble heart that I really look upon you as a brother, and that never will any happen I shall still keep a warm place in my heart for Jack Dawes."

"And you will not have me, Nina?" asked Jack, still holding her tight, as if he could not let her go. "You know I love you, Nina."

"I know you do, Jack. I could not doubt your affection for me, my friend. How quaint it you say a thing I feel bound to believe your word."

"You may, miss Nina. I never told a lie—that is to say, a wilful one—in all my life. Here's my home for you, and here's my love. Nan will be kind to me, try and like me a little, and let that be an end of the matter."

"Shall I? Jack, when you for a brother," said Nina, sadly and firmly. "I see now that it would be neither right or possible for me to give you any other name."

"You don't love me," said Jack, mournfully; "I might have known you couldn't, such a great, rough, uncultured fellow as I am."

"Yes, Jack," Nina answered, smiling at him faintly through her tears, "I do love you; I couldn't help it after to-night. I love you as a sister loves a true, generous, generous brother. I tell you that until the last day of my life I shall never forget you in my prayers. Now touch my forehead with me go, and God ever bless you, brother Jack!"

"God ever bless you, Nina!" he answered, as he pressed his lips reverentially first on one hand and then on the other that clasped his grasp.

Then Nina slipped away to her own room and pleaded illness, in order that she might not be called down to take her place at the dinner-table. Presently Jack came to her with the offer of a glass of wine; Jack had sent her, she said. Nina drank the wine, refusing to eat lest she should be choked, and then sent her compassionate friend. She gulped down the wine, holding the glass unsteadily in her nervous fingers; then she stooped and kissed her, speaking a few gentle words of commiseration.

She believed that Nina had refused Jack, and was grateful to her for it; and now that Nina was no longer dependent on him, it was only natural to share her brother's admiration for their beautiful guest. But there was a strong feeling in Jack's heart against their errors, which she understood its meaning. Jack's trouble and her visitor's sudden disappearance had appeared to Anna a full confirmation of her worst fears, and her brother's sorrow weighed as nothing against her own sense of relief. Perhaps, after all, Anna was not more selfish than the rest of us; but it seemed so to Nina, remembering how Jack had spoken of sacrificing his love and hope for this one girl, and then inwardly congratulate herself at his disappointment and misery. She was glad when Anna could be persuaded that talking made her head worse and had gone downstairs. She was still alone when the next day she accessed the threshold of her own home, and met Captain Marsh's welcoming hand and smile.

WHAT OUR FARMERS SHOULD BE.—Dr. Muzzey (formerly Mitchel) has penned many touchingly beautiful and long-to-be-remembered sayings, but the following is among the best—at least—"Don't keep a solemn face when you go out once a month with your parson or sewing society. Hang around your walls pictures, which tell stories of cheery, hope, courage, faith and charity. Make your living room the merriest and most cheerful in the house. Let the place be such that when your boy has come to distant lands, or even worse, perhaps, he drops to a single glance in the door while passing, he feels again the thrill of the still homesick pang once across the desolation, bringing him back to his home and love. Have no quarrels about your house, no one person never open, no thanks that are always short."

PRESENTATION OF MEDALS TO GALLANT SOLDIERS OF THE FIFTH ARMY CORPS, AT GEN. WARREN'S HEADQUARTERS, NEAR SIX-MILE HOUSE, VA., SEPT. 13.—FROM A SKETCH BY D. DOUGLAS FORBES.

PRESENTATION OF MEDALS TO GALLANT SOLDIERS

Of the Fifth Army Corps, at Six-Mile House, Va., Sept. 13, 1864.

A recent Act of Congress authorised rewarding enlisted men by presenting them with medals for deeds of valor performed in the field. The first occasion took place at the headquarters of Gen. Warren's fifth army corps, on Sept. 13.

The spot chosen was Gen. Warren's headquarters, and, although the order for the presentation did not arrive until 11 o'clock, through the exertions of Gen. Warren and his Adjutant-General, Lieut.-Col. Locke, everything was in readiness by half-past three, at which hour Gen. Crawford's division was drawn up in front of headquarters, an impromptu platform erected, which was gaily decked off with flags, among which were the captured rebel flags, bands of music stationed, and everything done to make the occasion one long to be remembered and talked over by those who witnessed it.

At four o'clock Gens. Meade, Warren and Hancock ascended the platform, Gens. Crawford, Ayres, Griffin, Baxter, Hunt and Bragg, with their staffs, standing near, as also a large number of regimental officers.

Gen. Warren, in a loud clear voice, stated the object for which they had met thus together, and called the names of those who were to be honored, desiring them to come forward to the platform. First Sergeant Shilling, Company H, 51 regiment of Delaware Volunteers, who captured a South Carolina flag; private F. C. Anderson, Company H, 18th Massachusetts Veteran Volunteers, who captured the flag of the 27th South Carolina, and private George H. Reed, Company E, 11th Pennsylvania Veteran Volunteers, who captured the flag of the 24th North Carolina, came forward to the platform, and, presenting arms, came to a shoulder.

Major-Gen. Meade, commanding the Army of the Potomac, then arose, and, during the utmost quiet and most respectful attention, addressed the soldiers.

Upon the conclusion of the address Gen. Warren stepped forward and asked the "boys" to give three hearty cheers to show the general they had a heart to appreciate his kindness, which was done, and they were given with a will that must have acquainted the "Johnnies" with the fact that something unusual was going on. The band struck up "Hail Columbia," the troops were marched off to their quarters, and Gen. Warren invited his guests to partake of a collation, which was not the least agreeable feature of the proceedings.

DESTRUCTION OF THE NEW YORK STATE INEBRIATE ASYLUM, AT BINGHAMPTON, BY FIRE, SEPT. 16.—FROM A SKETCH BY E. G. ROWE.

To Prevent Gas Explosions.—Everybody should be aware of the fact that coal-gas, mixed with common air, will explode like gunpowder when flame of any kind is brought into it; and that, consequently, there is great danger when gas is suffered to escape from a pipe into an apartment. Although the quantity escaping is so small as to be harmless, it may be discovered by its peculiar smell, but whenever this is perceived, the room should not be entered with a lighted candle without first opening the windows, and thus setting free the imprisoned air, so destructive to life and property.

RECEPTION OF REBEL PRISONERS AT THE PRISON, ELMIRA, N. Y.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, W. T. CRANE.

PRISON AT ELMIRA FOR SOUTHERN SOLDIERS.

THE treatment of our prisoners of war taken by the rebels has been one of the most revolting exhibitions which the world has ever witnessed. England herself, with all her partiality for the South, shrinks in horror from the spectacle of such barbarity. We reluctantly gave some months since photographs of returned prisoners. One of the prisoners confined at Anderson, Ga., has attested the truth of the picture as witnessed by him in thousands of cases at Anderson.

In contrast with this we give a view of the prison at Elmira, used by our Government for the prisoners captured by us. It is a large and well conducted place of confinement, humanity and not retaliation being our policy.

The camp for rebel prisoners at Elmira barracks No. 3 was first used for the present purpose July 6, 1864. It is an area of 40 acres, surrounded by a simple board fence some 15 feet in height, guards being stationed on platforms at the top of the fence every 20 or 30 feet. The business of guarding the prisoners is, however, a sinecure. The officers on duty state that the captives evince no disposition to escape. They have no desire to return to the felicities of Southern soldiery. Undoubtedly should single individuals attempt to borrow under the fence, or should a large number make a rush against it, their chance for escape would be very good; but apparently the prisoners would not leave if the fence and guards were entirely removed.

The plot constituting the prison is finely situated on an excellent piece of ground about a mile from Elmira, and though entirely closed as stated, the prisoners are not deprived of a view of external nature; for on one side rise pine-clad hills, high up into the air, visible from all parts of the prison. The prisoners are all provided with bunks in the same kind of rough barracks as are used for sheltering our own men at the various places of rendezvous before going into the field. A very large building is appropriated to the culinary department, and is fitted up like the kitchen of a great hotel, with about a dozen ranges, containing boilers, etc., and there is, also, a large oven, where sufficient bread, from good flour, is baked daily. The cooks and bakers are, of course, prisoners.

Clothing is furnished to the prisoners by the Government when their own becomes too much worn to be serviceable.

The whole appearance of the camp is very neat, working parties from among the prisoners being constantly employed in policing the grounds.

U. S. GENERAL HOSPITAL AT ELMIRA, N. Y.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, W. T. CRANE.

The daily ration is as follows: Pork or bacon, 19 oz. in lieu of fresh beef; or fresh beef, 14 oz.; flour or soft bread, 16 oz.; or hard bread, 14 oz.; or corn meal, 16 oz. To the 100 rations: Beans or peas, 12½ lb.; or rice or hominy, 8 lbs.; soap, 4 lbs.; vinegar, 3 quarts; salt, 2½ lbs.; potatoes, 15 lbs.

Sugar, coffee and tea are issued to the sick and wounded on the recommendation of the surgeon, at the rate of 12 lbs. of sugar, five of ground coffee, or seven of green, or one pound of tea to every 100 rations, every other day. To working parties of prisoners nearly the same ration is given in all respects as to our soldiers in the field.

Notwithstanding the ration for the prisoner is somewhat less than that issued to our own soldiers—and very appropriately so, since they do not hard work—yet, in reality, they get the benefit of the entire ration. For the difference between the prison ration and that of the United States soldiers is credited on the books of the Commissary of Prisoners, and expended for the benefit of the prisoners in such ways as the commanding officer may direct. This fund, it will be seen, grows rapidly to a large sum.

These arrangements apply not only to the prison at Elmira, but to all others. The Elmira prison is for private soldiers, and if they live so comfortably, it can be imagined that the officers on Johnson's island, and at other places, who have money of their own for the purchase of little luxuries, must pass their time as agreeably as the conditions of prison existence will permit. How utterly false, therefore, are the statements made from time to time by Jeff Davis, to the world, that Southern prisoners are badly treated.

Enough has been founded on the statements of returned prisoners, to exhibit the state of matters in Southern prisons; but lest these reports should be considered exaggerated, we refer to a very readable book by Col. Cavada, giving an account of his life in Libby Prison. This place, it will be recollected, is used for confining officers only, and consequently the brutalities experienced by private soldiers, at their particular prisons, are here not practised. But notice the petty annoyances, the absence of provisions for cleanliness and comfort, the pillaging of boxes sent from the North, the heartless insults of the guards, which are detailed by the writer of this book! How does the management of a Southern prison contrast with that of a Northern? In the one the unhappy inmates are treated as brutes—in the other as men.

The camp is at present commanded by Major H. V. Colt, the post by Lieut.-Col. Eastman. The guard consists of the 54th, 56th, 58th, 77th, 98th, 99th, 104th N. Y. S. N. G., with sections of a regular battery, under Major Lewis Batty, the Rochester Grays, and two companies of the 9th V. R. C.

The treatment in sickness is no less marked in its difference from that of the South to our poor fellows. There medical attendance is seldom given, and when given often of a most brutality.

The hospital at Elmira, which we also sketch, is conducted with every care to cleanliness and health, and the treatment given such as many of our Northern poor seldom get.

THE Indian are so vain of their hair that they are proud of getting it into the papers.

MARRIAGEABLE ladies should frequent the theatre before the curtain is drawn up; they would then be sure of an overture.

"I CAN'T say I admire your style of acting," said a landlady to a strolling player, when she caught him stealing the spoons.

DR. FRANKLIN, speaking of education, says: "If a man empties his purse into his head, no man can take it away from him. An investment of knowledge always pays the best interest."

FOLLOWING Suit—A dandy following the fashion.

THE prettiest hood in the world—childhood.

THE ruling passion strong in death—a shoemaker breathing his last.

IT is generally true that we judge too liberty and too broadly the evils of every office which we do not ourselves hold.

MANY regard themselves as merely disinterested, impartial arbitrators, merely because they incorrectly state that others shall be so.

NAVAL ANTIDOTE.—One of the royal frigates being at sea on a winter's night, in a tremendous gale, the ground broke, and so the ship began to drive. The lieutenant of the watch ran down to the cabin, awoke the captain from his sleep, and told him that the anchor had come home.

"Well," said the captain, rubbing his eyes, "I think the anchor's perfectly right—who would stay out such a night as this?"

A FEW SIMPLE QUESTIONS.—Did you ever know anything good as a comparison to trembling but an aspen leaf? Did you ever see the shame which are said occasionally to bind the forehead of sinful? Did you ever light your cigar with the flames of love? Was ever your face furrowed by the anxious cares of prosperity? or, have you been obliged to resort to an umbrella by the dark clouds of adversity? Did you ever see an inhabitant brow, an adamantine soul, an ivy heart, or an iron frame?

IN an old paper, printed in New London, nearly a century ago, we find the following on matrimony:

"Oh, matrimony! thou are like
To Jeremiah's figs;
The good is very good; the bad
Too sour to grin the pigs.
I never dreamed of such a state,
When I a-bus'ness courted,
Wife, mother, nurse, seamstress, cook, housekeeper, chambermaid, laundress, dairy-woman, and scrub generally, filling the work of six.
For the sake of being supported."

CARD TABLE SIGNALS.—"Never," said Theodore Hook, "let man and wife play together at whist. There are always telegraphs; and if they fancy their looks are washed, they can always communicate by words. I found out that I could never win of Sarah among all her wiles. I mentioned this one day and was answered: 'No, you never can win of them.' 'Why?' said I. 'Because,' said my friend, 'they have enough behind a side.' 'Dear me!' said I, 'signals by looks?' 'No,' said my wife. 'If Mrs. Sarah imagines she has a Sniggering says: 'Dear, begin.' Dear begins with 'a,' so she counts one, and so on over over from the lady. It be has to lead, and she says: 'S., my love,' she wants a spade. 'Horrid, my dear, how long you are scoring your cards.' Mrs. Sniggering stamps down a heart; and exclaims: 'Come, my love,' on either side, produces a club.'"

NOT A FALSEHOOD.—"Do you call them large lumps of sugar?" said a lady to a waiter.

"Why, yes; they are considerable large."

"They may be for lumps, but they are nothing to an ounce I saw the other day."

"And how large was the ounce?"

"Why, sir, it weighed 40 pounds."

"Forty pounds?"

"Yes, sir, one of the layers, and the 16th layer went round a barrel that held four gallons!"

"Are you sure?"

"You don't mean to say I tell a falsehood?"

"Oh, no! what a whopper of an ounce! I mean."

AN INVITATION TO DINNER.—It was observed that a certain covetous rich man never invited any one to dine with him.

"I'll buy a wager," said a wag, "I get an invitation from him."

The wager being accepted, he goes the next day to the rich man's house about the time he was to dine, and tells the servant he must speak with his master immediately, for he came to save him a thousand pounds.

"Sir," said the servant to his master, "here is a man in a great hurry to speak with you; he says he can save you a thousand pounds."

Desires the master.

"What is that, sir; you can save me a thousand pounds?"

"Yes sir, I can, but I see you are at dinner; I will go away, and call again."

"Oh, pray, sir, come in and take dinner with me."

"I shall be troublesome."

"Not at all."

The invitation was accepted.

As soon as dinner was over, and the family retired:

"Well, sir, will the man of the house, "now to your business. I am here how I am to save a thousand pounds?"

"Why, I hear, sir, you have a daughter to dispose of in marriage."

"I have, sir."

"And you intend to portion her with ten thousand pounds?"

"I do, sir."

"Why, then, sir, let me have her, and I will take her with nine thousand."

The master of the house arose in a passion, and kicked him out of doors.

CURSING.—The portuguese, was mounted on a runaway horse with the high bridle bounds, and excused himself for riding against Lord Alvanley, by saying, "Oh, my lord, I can't hold him, he's so hot!"

"Let him, Gunter, let him!" was the consoling response.

"JEANNIE," said a Cameronian to his daughter, who was asking her consent to accompany her sweet and favored suitor to the altar, "Jeannie, it's a very solemn thing to get married."

"I know it, father," replied the sensible damsel, "but it's a great deal solemner not to."

ON account of the number of oil wells in the country, a Western exchange thinks the United States should be called Modern Greece!

A BUDGET OF BLUNDERS.

We have all heard of Sir Boyle Roche's blunders. Dickens gives an account of some of those which, happily, are preserved. In one of his speeches he said:

"Sir, I would give up half—nay, the whole of the Constitution, to preserve the entire."

This, however, was parliamentary.

Hearing that Admiral Howe was in quest of the French fleet, he remarked, somewhat pleasantly, that the Admiral would "sweep the French fleet off the face of the earth."

By-and-bye came dangerous times of dissatisfaction, and house man's lives were insecure. Sir Boyle writes to his friend, and tells him the capital the discouraging view of his position:

"You may judge," he says, "of our state when I tell you that I write this sword in one hand and a pistol in the other."

On one occasion when the famous letters to the Public Advertiser were attracting universal attention, Sir Boyle was heard to complain bitterly of the attacks of a certain anonymous writer called Junius. He it was who recounted that marvellous performances in gymnastics, when, in a transport of loyalty, he "stood prostrate at the feet of his sovereign." He it was who denounced in withering language the apostate politician who "turned his back upon himself." He it was who introduced to public notice the ingenious yet particularly confused metaphor of the rat:

"Sir," he said, addressing the Speaker of the Irish House, "I smell a rat. I see him floating in the air, but, mark me, I shall yet nip him in the bud!"

There was the famous speech which confounded generations:

"I don't see, Mr. Speaker, why we should put ourselves out of the way to serve posterity. What has ever posterity done for us?"

He was a little disconcerted by the burst of laughter that followed, and proceeded to explain his meaning:

"By posterity, sir, I do not mean our ancestors, but those who come immediately after them."

His invitation to the noblemen on his travels was hospitable and well conceived, if not lucid:

"I hope, my lord, it never you come within a mile of my house, you'll call at once at sight."

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

The Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that subscriptions will be received for Coupon Treasury Notes, payable three years from August 15th, 1864, with semi-annual interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum—principal and interest both to be paid in lawful money.

These notes will be convertible, at the option of the holder at maturity, into six per cent. gold bearing bonds, payable not less than five nor more than twenty years from their date, as the Government may elect. They will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1,000 and $5,000, and all subscriptions must be for fifty dollars, or some multiple of fifty dollars.

As the notes draw interest from August 15, persons making deposits subsequent to that date must pay the interest accrued from date of note to date of deposit.

Parties depositing twenty-five thousand dollars and upwards for these notes at any one time will be allowed a commission of one-quarter of one per cent.

Special Advantages of this Loan.

IT IS A NATIONAL SAVINGS BANK, offering a higher rate of interest than any other, and the best security. Any savings bank which pays its depositors in U. S. Notes considers that it is paying to the best circulating medium of the country, and it cannot pay in anything better, for its own assets are either in Government securities or in notes or bonds payable in Government paper.

Convertible into a Six per Cent. 5-20 Gold Bond.

In addition to the very liberal interest on the notes for three years, this privilege of conversion is now worth about three per cent. per annum, for the current rate for 5-20 Bonds is not less than nine per cent. pre-mium, and before the war the premium on six per cent. U. S. stocks was over twenty per cent. It will be seen that the actual profit on this loan, at the present market rate, is not less than ten per cent. per annum.

Its Exemption from State or Municipal Taxation.

Reasons from all the advantages we have enumerated, a special act of Congress exempts all bonds and Treasury notes from local taxation. On the average, this exemption is worth about two per cent. per annum, according to the rate of taxation in various parts of the country.

It is believed that no securities offer so great inducements to lenders as those issued by the Government. In all other forms of indebtedness, the faith or ability of private parties, or stock companies, or separate communities, only, is pledged for payment, while the property of the country is held to secure the discharge of all the obligations of the United States.

Subscriptions will be received by the Treasurer of the United States, at Washington, the several Assistant Treasurers and designated Depositaries, and by all National Banks which are depositaries of public money, and throughout the country will give further information and

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of imported Bitters, and when domestic compounds purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery grain combining mail or fusel oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, anti-bilious and aperient herbs and plants, and not as a sale and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its hundred complaints, the preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Bitters advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 472—Vol. XIX.] NEW YORK, OCTOBER 15, 1864. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly, 15 Weeks $1 00.

Richmond.

The recent military operations on the north side of the James river, and on the south side of the Appomattox, will have satisfied the inquiring and intelligent reader that Richmond and the army of Gen. Lee, the last forlorn hope of Jeff Davis, are in a very critical situation—a situation from which they can be rescued only by a miracle.

From the beginning of this campaign we have, from time to time, endeavored to show that the enclosing triple lines of elaborate fortifications constructed for the defence of Richmond involved a useless expenditure of engineering skill, labor, time and money—for the simple reason that in cutting off the city from its sources of subsistence, it must soon become untenable. Upon this idea the operations of Gen. Grant against the city have been conducted; and bearing the important fact in mind, that even rebel soldiers must have something to eat to keep them on their legs, it will need only a glance at the present embarrassments of Gen. Lee to perceive that he must very soon make his election in an effort to break through the tightening lines of "the Yankees," or in an evacuation, which, though not perhaps as speedily, will be as inevitably fatal to the "Confederacy" as the capitulation of his army.

What is the present condition of Richmond in regard to this vital matter of provisions? With flour there at $500 per barrel even in "Confederate" paper, valued at five cents on the dollar, the supply must be very short. The citizens of Richmond, and the army of Lee, in fact, are dependent for their supplies of subsistence upon their railroads, and the the canal communicating with the city from the south and west. The hitherto fruitful districts of Virginia north of Richmond, including the beautiful country east of the Blue ridge, and the great and fertile Shenandoah valley, have been so wasted and eaten out by contending armies during these three years of war, that they have hardly subsistence left sufficient to save their fixed population from famine through the coming winter. Lee's supplies are partly drawn by way of Lynchburg from Southwestern Virginia, but mainly from North and South Carolina and Georgia.

What follows? Cut him off from his Southern lines of communication, and, in plain terms, he is starved out of Richmond. To this end a most important step was made by Gen. Grant in striding across the Weldon railroad. On Friday last another point was gained in the lodgment effected upon the Southside road, connecting Petersburg with the Danville road. Another advance to the junction of the Danville with the Richmond and Petersburg roads, some 20 miles west of Poplar Grove, the position secured by Gen. Meade on Friday, the 30th ult., reduces Lee and Richmond for their supplies to the James river canal from Lynchburg, a line wholly inadequate to meet the necessities of the case. On Friday evening, the last day of September, Gen. Lee was razed to the Danville road and James river canal, with the first in imminent danger from Gen. Meade's advanced lines, and with the other menaced by the victorious army of Sheridan. At the same time, from the new position gained by Gen. Butler's army, on Thursday, the 29th, on the north side of the James river, within seven miles of Richmond, and held on Friday against a heavy attack, Lee is in danger, at any moment, of having his forces at Petersburg cut off from Richmond. This misfortune must be avoided if necessary, even at the cost of sacrificing Petersburg.

We write this article upon the basis of Gen. Grant's operations of Thursday and Friday, the 29th and 30th of September. Before it reaches the hands of our readers still further and greater advantages, we expect, will be gained towards the reduction and occupation, by the "oldline," of the rebel capital. It will suffice, however, for the present, that in operating simultaneously on both extremes of the enemy's lines Gen. Grant has developed the weakness of Lee, has shewn that the strength, the prestige and morale of his boasted veteran legions are gone, and that the only doubt regarding this campaign against Richmond is, whether the city will be defended to the extremity of the capitulation or dispersion of Lee's forces, or will be abandoned to save his army.

Brave old Admiral Farragut's magnificent achievements in Mobile Bay, and the crowning success of Gen. Sherman's grand campaign at Atlanta, exercised their moral influence to our advantage in Virginia; but when to these serious rebel misfortunes in Georgia and Alabama were added their late disasters in the Shenandoah valley, the previously still defiant spirit of the veterans of Lee was broken, and their gorgeous castle in the distant clouds of an imperial Southern Confederacy vanished from their sight. But the causes which have carried despair into the heart of the rebellion and a havoc among the gold gamblers of Wall street, have infused a spirit of confidence and enthusiasm among the rank and file of Gen. Grant's armies which renders them irresistible. Our prophecies are becoming the universal conviction—that the end of the rebellion and a new epoch of harmony, prosperity, strength and glory to the Union are at hand.

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA—GRANT'S ARMY.

Sheridan's overwhelming success, exceeding even Grant's anticipations, enables the latter to move. Leaves of absence to General officers were countermanded. Lee is evidently about to abandon Petersburg and concentrate. He has made a new course for the Southside railroad, removed store houses and heavy guns.

But Grant was not to move there. On the 29th he began operations north of the James. Gen. Ord's 18th corps carried the strong rebel fortifications and long line of entrenchments below Chapin's farm, with 15 cannon and 300 prisoners.

Gen. Ord was wounded, and Brig.-Gen. Hiram Burnham, of Maine, killed, as they entered the fort; Kautz pursued the flying rebels to Richmond.

At the same time Gen. Birney (10th corps) advanced from Deep Bottom and carried New Market road entrenchments, scattering the enemy in every direction, his colored troops, Paine's division, 18th army corps, carrying the well defended heights amid an appalling fire. Birney then pushed on, carrying a second line, but at the junction of the New Market and Varina roads found formidable works. Birney prepared for a general assault, which was manfully made, but failed to carry them, though the men got so far that they had to wait till night to get back.

On the 30th, at 3 P. M., Grant having drawn Lee's attention to Richmond by the recent successful advance in that direction, pushed Warren forward, and that General, whose very name is success, with his own 5th and part of the 9th army corps, advanced towards Peplar Spring church, and carried the enemy's line on the extreme left, capturing a number of prisoners, but failed to storm the line at Peeble's farm.

At the same time Lee had, as we have remarked, left these lines almost unprotected, to mass his troops for an assault on the works taken by Ord and Birney. He made two assaults on three columns at 3 P. M., but was repulsed.

The panic in Richmond is terrible.

SHERIDAN'S ARMY.

Sheridan's motto is onward! After the victory at Fisher's hill he pushed on in pursuit, sending Torbert with his cavalry up the Luray valley. Had Torbert been able to reach the point aimed at he would have captured Early and all his host, but the rebel General saw his danger and sent Wickham to protect the point. Torbert defeated Wickham with loss, but the delay was all that Early needed to escape.

Sheridan pushed on, after being joined by Torbert near New Market, and on the 26th occupied Staunton and Waynesboro.

On the 29th he was pressing the remnant of Early's army at Brown's gap in the Blue Ridge, where the rebel General held a strong position, but Sheridan assures Gen. Grant that he is amply competent to carry out all his plans.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Little is doing at Charleston, but the blockade is so inefficient that two vessels a week at least run in and out.

GEORGIA.

The rebels are now using every effort to isolate Atlanta by attacking the line of railroad from Chattanooga.

Gov. Brown has recalled the Georgia militia from Hood's army. That defeated General is now entrenched on the West Point railroad.

Gen. Sherman has finally exchanged 2,000 of his own army, on his own terms, with Hood. The rebels have a very chivalrous way of sending us dying men, soldiers whose term of service has long expired or whom otherwise we cannot use, and receiving from us able-bodied men. Sherman required that for Hood's men he should get men of his own army fit for duty and whose term of service had not expired. There was of course a howl at Sherman's barbarity, but we are glad to see that he has carried his point.

ALABAMA—TENNESSEE.

Hood, at the last accounts, was marching into Alabama to join in the effort to dislodge us from that State.

Cols. Campbell and Jamison, with the 6th and 8th Indiana cavalry at Athens, were attacked by Forrest at the head of 8,000 men and 10 pieces of artillery, and after a fight of two hours forced to surrender on the 24th. Forrest murdered all negro soldiers.

The rebels also destroyed several miles of the Tennessee and Alabama railroad between Decatur and Athens.

On the 25th Forrest destroyed the Sulphur Spring trestle, and Col. Pace evacuated Elk Horn bridge immediately after.

Rousseau, standing firm in Forrest's front, at Pulaski, in force, compelled Forrest to retire with the loss of over 200 men.

Two trains were captured on the Chattanooga railroad at Big Shanty.

Forrest had reached Fayetteville with his whole force on his way to the Chattanooga railroad.

The rebels had destroyed all the bridges between Athens and Pulaski, a distance of 30 miles.

Beauregard is to command in Tennessee.

MISSOURI.

On the 24th Sept. Shelby occupied Fredericktown, 20 miles east of Pilot Knob, with 4,000 cavalry.

Price is also said to have entered Missouri with 30,000 men.

Gen. Rosecrans has called out the militia, and will do all that can be done with his means to drive Price out of the State, but it is sad to see the hero of Iuka and Stone river left without a regularly constituted army to hold a State so deeply tinctured with rebel feeling, and where the men seem to take oaths of allegiance as freely and with as hearty a chuckle as they do a glass of whiskey.

On the 27th Mineral Point was attacked by the rebels, who were repulsed. They, however, captured Potosi on that day.

Ewing was ordered to evacuate Pilot Knob, but found his communications cut.

The rebels, under Price, are pillaging and destroying everything. Franklin and Ironton are seriously menaced.

LOUISIANA.

Gen. Banks relinquished command of the department, Sept. 23, and came to New York. Maj.-Gen. Hurlbut succeeds him.

NAVAL.

The ex-rebel steamers Gaines and Selma have been silencing the rebel batteries near Mobile.

TOWN GOSSIP.

A FALL in gold! For the week this has been the all absorbing talk, the millenium of the hour. Gold, like some drunken thing, after staggering and reeling, came down with an awful crash, and brought with it loving friends, who had walked complacently on either side to support its tottering steps. With each staggering step made by the yellow god, the good people over the length and breadth of the land shouted with joy. What matter to them that speculators and brokers were financially crushed, that men went stark, staring mad over their ruin, there was to be cheaper bread and more butcher's meat for the limited amount of cash, winter clothing would come down and coal be mortally wounded.

The hope was realised, and, for the moment, shopkeepers, giving way to panic, made desperate attempts to force off their overstock by marking down the prices and offering them at something corresponding to the value of our currency. In many cases this was no doubt honestly done, but in the majority it was simply a ruse to induce extra purchases, or to galvanize trade under the moment of excitement. One large house upon Broadway, which shall be nameless, closed their doors upon the public, putting large placards in the window informing eager would-be purchasers that they would open that afternoon with the stock marked down. At the appointed time they did open to a rush of the fairer portion of creation, one of whom confidentially informs us that each piece of goods was furnished with a new label, on which a price, which was to be supposed as the old one, had been marked off and a new one, about 40 per cent. lower, had been written below. She says that the whole affair smelled rather suspicious, from the simple fact that within a week previous she had bought the identical marked down goods at a trifle less over that same counter. And of such material is a shopkeeper made.

To those dwelling in the country it is scarcely understandable the general joy that pervaded all classes on the announcement that gold had fallen over 20 per cent. in a single day. It was the universal topic in cars, stages and the streets. From the stage of one of our theatres it was announced to the audience and received with three hearty and enthusiastic cheers, and made the subject of many small impromptu speeches on street corners, hotels and public-houses.

In Wall street a fall such as we have noted is equal at once to a panic, and on the day when it comes off knots of men, from 5 to 50, can be seen everywhere eagerly talking and comparing notes. One lucky individual speculator happened, either by good fortune or by far-sightedness, to sell about $1,000,000, deliverable on a certain day of this week, at 220. He filled his contract when the article was at 186, clearing the handsome difference of 34 per cent., which, upon $1,000,000, is not a bad thing to take.

When will this patient, enduring donkey, New York city, throw its political riders and set to work kicking out the manifold nuisances and annoyances under which it continually suffers? We cannot help thinking this as we look on at the petty squabble now taking place between the Mayor and the Street Inspector in reference to the bone boiling and fat smelting nuisances of the city. These places are admitted on all hands to be in the highest degree detrimental to health and to life, and that it is imperatively necessary they should be driven from the city, and yet in the face of this they are suffered to remain day after day and month after month, simply in consequence of the small quarrels of two officials, for neither of whom the public cares ninepence. The City Inspector accuses the Mayor of wilfulness in not calling a meeting of the Board of Health, who alone have the power to abate nuisances, and the Mayor retorts by saying that he will not do so because the call would add to the emoluments of the City Inspector's office, and so the matter now stands, while the offence is rank and smells over the entire face of the city. Let these officials wait in their fancied strength until the hour of awaking comes, and our word for it the people will, of their own accord and in their own way, remove these nuisances, even though they have first to remove both Mayor and Street Inspector.

It seems strange that in the midst of all our excitements and tribulation, that at no time previous have places of public amusement been more patronised than the present. With several dozen of theatres and entertainments in full blast nightly, not one can complain of want of patronage, and it seems only necessary that a manager should throw open his doors and the public rush pell-mell to crowd his house.

The week, without offering anything of especial novelty, has nevertheless been one of great prosperity. The event has been the production at the Olympic of what the manager is pleased to term a literal dramatic version of Charles Dickens's "Martin Chuzzlewit," a literal version which we fail to see, though at the same time admitting the merit of the play. It is an adaptation by Mr. Fiske, the dramatic editor of the New York Herald, and may be more strictly called a series of tableaux than a play. It is put upon the stage in most excellent style as everything at the Olympic, and the make up of the characters is in the highest degree commendable. Mrs. Wood makes up for Bailey capitally, and the inexpressibles become her much. Mr. Davidge as old Martin Chuzzlewit adds another leaf to his laurel of old men characters, and earns the reputation of being the best actor in that line upon the American stage. Mr. Mortimer as Montague Tigg is admirable, and several of the company who have little to say and do say and do it with a reality that deserves high commendation. The piece is of that kind capable of achieving a success, and will, without doubt, have a run for several weeks.

Wallack's seems to go on in its old-fashioned sleepy way, and its audiences, as though possessed of a season ticket and bound to get the worth of it, crowd the house nightly, no matter what trash is offered for their entertainment or how badly it is acted. The present season at this house has been behind the age, and at present shows little chance of getting up with it. The day has gone by when the public can be put off with poor plays, badly acted, on the reputation of the house, and sooner or later the deliberately formed opinion of the people will tell to the downfall of those who trust too implicitly to the stupidity of their auditors.

Mr. Forrest is still at Niblo's, filling the house nightly to overflowing, and convincing his critics that if he has declined—as many of them assert—in his power as an actor, he has not declined in his power of drawing houses.

Mr. Oscanyan announces the resumption of his lectures on and illustrations of Turkish life, immensely improved from last season. Mr. Oscanyan has fitted himself out with full representatives from every grade of Turkish life, and will give us opportunities of beholding the Turk as he is at home, the Circassian beauty, the belle, the bride, the mother, the babe and the slave. These entertainments will be the feature of the season, and will do more to let us into inside life in Turkey than all the books that ever were written.

Heller announces a new sensation, but declines letting a curious public know what it is, simply informing them in a mysterious way that it is something that will throw all his former diablerie into the shade, and demonstrate clearly that he must have direct dealing with somebody with an unmentionable name.

This week inaugurates the Italian Opera, and we predict for it the most brilliant season ever known in New York. There has been no puffing of the artists in advance, and they are left to the cool dispassionate judgment of the public. What that judgment will be we are not yet prepared to say. We will take another week to think upon it, and in the meantime we can only commend the manager, who has well arranged everything connected with the house, and created a financial success for his season before it is begun.

Artemus Ward announces himself almost ready with his "wax figures," and figures of speech, to show up Brigham Young and all his family. In the second week of this month, Artemus opens at Dodworth Hall, when Salt Lake City will be turned inside out for public inspection.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Secretary Stanton has ordered that the wages of the sewing women in the employment of the Government shall be increased 20 per cent.

—— The number of persons who arrived in Quebec during the month of June last was 6,450, of whom 1,065 were from England, 928 from Ireland, 501 from Scotland, 1,204 from Germany, 2,322 from Norway, and the remaining 435 from Sweden and Belgium; 237 immigrants were provided with passages by charitable societies, and 6,218 immigrated at their own expense. 1,052 British and 3,125 foreign immigrants proceeded thence to the United States.

—— The anthracite coal tonnage of Pennsylvania is again heavy, reaching 257,660 tons, increasing the coal tonnage of the year to 7,547,169 tons, against 6,773,768 tons to corresponding time last year, being an increase of 678,601 tons. The trade, though active in the way of production and shipment to market, is a little dull in the way of sales, and prices are weak.

—— On Tuesday, Sept. 27, a large ratification meeting of the supporters of Mr. Lincoln was held at the Cooper Institute and around the building. W. O. Noyes was called to the chair. Speeches were made by Montgomery Blair, Deming, McKean and other prominent Republican politicians. The whole affair was wound up outside with fireworks and cheers.

—— The fluctuations in gold have been remarkable. The near approach of the downfall of the rebellion, chiefly through the victories of Sherman and Sheridan and the prudent attitude of Grant, convince speculators that the time is coming when the necessaries of life must be brought nearer to their peace standard. The best way to accelerate such a result is to economise. It is computed there are over 150 large drygoods firms about to close up their business. This will throw an enormous quantity of goods into the market, and bring down their prices.

—— In Portland, Maine, volunteering is quite brisk. The city gives, including State bounties, $1,000 for three years' men; $700 for two; and $400 for one year men.

—— The immigration at New York, during the month of August last reached the extraordinary figure of 22,417 souls, being an increase of 6,920 over the corresponding month last year. The Germans exceed the Irish, there being nearly 9,000 of the former and nearly 8,000 of the latter.

—— The total subscriptions to the 7-30's, to Sept. 17, is over $35,000,000; and the total subscription to the 10-40 loan $114,000,000.

Southern.—We have been loth to believe all the charges of inhumanity made against the rebels, but when we read in their journals such fiendish sentiments as are expressed in the following paragraph from the Meridian (Ga.) Daily Clarion, of Aug. 25, we can no longer refuse to believe them capable of any barbarity: "During one of the intensely hot days of last week more than 300 sick and wounded Yankees died at Andersonville. We thank heaven for such blessings."

—— The rebel papers all express the utmost faith that Beauregard will check the victorious course of Gen. Sherman in Georgia.

Military.—The Washington Republican says: "On Thursday, Sept. 15, a portion of the 13th New York cavalry started from their quarters, at Falls Church, on a scout, with three days' rations. After scouting for six days, living on the enemy's country, they heard of Mosby's whereabouts. The commanding officer of the 13th caused a number of his men to disguise themselves as guerillas. This party came up with Mosby, who was entirely taken in by the ruse, near Centreville. They advanced leisurely towards him, and when within firing distance commenced discharging their revolvers. Mosby and his party returned the fire. As Mosby was in the act of raising his pistol to fire, —— Smith, a private of the 13th, took deliberate aim and struck the pistol on Mosby's left side, the ball gliding off and entering his groin. At the same instant he dropped his arms, wheeled his horse and galloped away. He was able to ride about a mile, but, becoming weakened by loss of blood, he concealed himself and party in one of his numerous lurking places until out of danger, and then was placed in an ambulance and sent to Richmond."

—— Gen. Beauregard has accepted the command of the rebel army of Tennessee.

—— Maj.-Gen. Banks and staff arrived in New York on the 30th of Sept.

—— Capt. Charles S. Bulkley, who has been for the past two years in the Department of the Gulf, superintending the construction of the military telegraph, will leave to-day for the West, to enter upon his duties as superintendent of the great overland telegraph around the world. The part of the line that he is to construct extends from Columbia river, in Oregon, to the mouth of the Amoor, in Asia, embracing the line across Behring Straits, a distance of more than 6,000 miles.

—— Gen. Grover, of Maine, in a letter to a friend, says: "In the recent battle at Jonesboro every Colonel in my division was killed or wounded." Gen. Grover commands a division in Sheridan's army.

Naval.—The London correspondent of the New York Herald writes as follows: "Admiral Farragut's performance in going himself into the maintop and dashing right by the forts, giving them broadside after broadside, excites intense admiration. An English army officer remarked to me that it called up the days of the heroes and demigods of ancient Greece. 'No such nautical exploit,' said he, 'has been seen in our day. Nelson was shot by a man in the roundtop of the enemy's ship, while Farragut put himself in the roundtop to be shot at. So long as you have such stuff among you, we shall never be ashamed.'"

Personal.—Mr. Fiske is the dramatist of "Martin Chuzzlewit," now performing at the Olympic.

—— Ex-Postmaster Blair, despite his summary ejectment from the Cabinet, is making stump speeches for Mr. Lincoln.

—— Vallandigham, while condemning McClellan's repudiating the Chicago platform, announced in a speech made at Sidney, Ohio, that he should support him.

—— The Griffin Rebel (Ga.) gives the following graphic account of Gen. Early: "Old Jubal Early, or as Gen. Lee calls him, his 'bad old man,' has won a name during his sojourn in the valley of Virginia of which he is well worthy. Did you ever see him? If not, you have missed one of the greatest curiosities of the war. He is a man of considerable corpulence, with a full face which has the appearance of the full moon when it is at its height in redness. He is about six feet high, and of immense structure. His voice sounds like a cracked Chinese fiddle, and comes from his mouth somewhat in the style of the Hardshell Baptist, with a long drawl, accompanied with an interpolation of oaths. In winter his head is encased in a net striped woollen skull cap drawn about his ears, while his body is contained within the embraces of a Virginia cloth overcoat, striking his heels. His legs are covered by leggings of the same material, wrapped from the feet upwards as high as the knees with white tape. He is brave as he is homely, and as homely as any man you ever saw, except Parson Brownlow, who is said to rival his Satanic Majesty in personal appearance. There are many incidents related of Old Jubal, but I cannot at present call to memory but one. During the battles in the Wilderness on one occasion a regiment from South Carolina was ordered to charge the enemy. For some reason they faltered. Old Jubal, hearing of it, rode up to the head of the column, and in that peculiarity of tone for which he was noted, cried out: 'Blast you, you got us into this d——d scrape, and by G— you shall help us out.' The regiment was so cut by the remark that they rushed upon the foe, driving him from every position."

—— The Sandusky Register says: "John Brown, a son of the great Ossawatomie Brown, of Harper's Ferry fame, lives on Put-in-bay island, where he is engaged in the grape culture. Being among the first of the patriots of the island to discover the rebel conspiracy to release the rebel prisoners on Johnson's island, he at once manned a boat, armed the crew to the teeth, and set sail by a roundabout way for Ottawa City—in order to avoid falling in with the pirates—to give information to the commander of the post of Johnson's island of the seizure of the Philo Parsons. He arrived at Ottawa City about dark, and from there footed along the shore to Fox's Dock, arriving about daylight the next morning."

—— Dan Rice, the circus man, is candidate for State Senator in one of the districts of Pennsylvania. His wife, who is separated from him, is now Mrs. Dan Drew, and manages the animals. The News says if Dan can manage the brutes in Congress as well as he did those in his caravan, he will be the right man in the right place.

—— The heir to Victor Emmanuel's crown, Prince Umberto, is only 20, but looks older. He is very like his father. His face is bronzed by exposure to wind and weather, and his whole appearance savors far more of the "warrior grim" than of the "carpet knight so trim." His features are irregular, but there is something frank, open and manly in his countenance that is likely to make him popular among a military people.

The ball entered his temple, but never by any chance a wound of a serious nature that he died soon after at the New York Hospital. Wilcoxen Harring, the parents in formal relation to Harrington, Harring was arrested by officer Seaman, of the Broadway police, and locked up in the Tombs to await the inquest. Harring is about 14 years of age. Gilbert, the lad who was killed, he stated that he did not know that the pistol was loaded when he pointed it towards Gilbert.

— On Saturday, the 10th Sept., says the Indiana (Penn.) American, an engine of the Pennsylvania Railroad, while being supplied with fuel and water, took wheels and ran away. It got loose from the supervisory to hitting a train West, got loose from the engine and ran off by itself for a while, smashing and panting as if giving challenge for a race. Engineer Blair, of the Express train of the last time, overtook at once on the north track in pursuit of the flying engine, being a short mile, outgot from the cars the runaway at Alexandria, and, running alongside, the engineer stepped on board and reversed the engine. The precaution was taken, to telegraph to White Hill, and have the switch turned, so as to have the wild train in case she reached that point.

— An outrageous attempt at robbery occurred at the house of Mr. Henry Strauss, in Woodcock township, Crawford county, on Saturday evening, Sept. 3, which is worth a brief notice. A man came to the door, which was answered by Mrs. S., who, upon opening it, was seized by two men, who attempted to gag her. They had even brought her husband to the door, who was knocked down and severely and painfully injured. A chance was then made for money, and a search was being undertaken, when the coming of a wagon caused the villains to beat a hasty retreat. Mr. Strauss is about 80 years of age, being one of the oldest and most worthy citizens in that community.

— The most startling and perhaps the largest robbery that ever occurred in Illinois was committed at Sterling, Whiteside county, Illinois, August 31. On Saturday of Mr. Gault's bank, was entered on Saturday night, and $40,000 taken from his safe, about $20,000 of which was in gold, and the rest in legal-tender currency, and the balance in United States bonds. Art, Science and Literature.—"Martin's Central View," a large and interesting picture promises to be one of the greatest efforts of modern chromo-lithography that has yet been put on the market, as it is the most accurate in design and coloring, ever issued in this country. A representation of New York's greatest achievement—the Central Park, it will doubtless have an unprecedented sale. The picture will be on exhibition at the Messrs. Appleton's, in Broadway, on and after October 1st. The publication has the recommend books will be opened. THE LATTICE AT SUNRISE.

As on my bed at dawn I mused and prayed,
I saw my father's face, and heard him say,
The flaunting leaves and fidgting birds withal—
A sunny phantom interlaced with shade;
Two months he is dead—I see him as I said,
What sweeter aid my matins could befall
Than this fair glory from the East hath made?
What holy sleights hath God, the Lord of all,
To bid me feel and see! my soul is free
To say we see not, for the glory comes
Nightly and daily, like the flowing sea;
And Sunday speeds the week, and Sunday quells
And, at prime hour, behold! He follows me
With golden shadows to my secret room!"

THE SECRET OF HAPPINESS.

"You seem very happy, dear Annie, always happy. I never saw yet any one who seemed more happy than you, and—"

"Oh! oh! Emily," replied Mrs. Danton, laughing. "In those words you have but twice used the verb to seem, and you look so inquisitive. Do you wish to be a little more enlightened about yourself, like the countryman in quarter of a hour? Happily, Harry is not here to see the cadence which I discover in the eyes of his betrothed; he would think that I was jealous of the soul of fear instead of joy at the eve of your nuptials."

"Done laugh at me, Annie, but speak to me as you used to do formerly. I have not a friend, sister or brother except, I have serious misgivings, I see so few married people really happy, happy as I wish to be. Never seem to approach nearer than my own heart, and I find only fissures. Now, have you never any little—quarrels?"

"No, no more now. We had one, and I believe that it made happy for a month to come, ha! ha!"

"Tell me of it, Annie, will you?"

"Yes, if you wish it; maybe it will be useful to you."

I was a very romantic young girl, so you know it, Emily; I had some friends whom I loved dearly, but that love did not satisfy me; my heart was yearning for something more, and I could not say what till the day I loved my husband. During the first months of our marriage I often asked myself if I was happy. "Yes," I said, "but I hoped to find it in? Am I as happy as I expected to be?" and my heart always replied: "Yes, and even more happy."

The romance of marriage, if I may express myself so, lasted a long time for me; as for me, I felt a most intense satisfaction when we were alone, when I was to walk about with him, and happy hours of the day were those we spent alone, reading and chatting. When slightly put out, I could not be at peace till I had made it up in the company of my husband. I feared above all to remain stupidly silent when with him, or to have nothing to speak of, like the wife of the old butcher's bill. I tried to recollect all the pretty things I had read, heard or thought, to repeat them to him, and when I had exhausted my stock, exhausted, we both had one hobby to ride; and so, when we were silent, it was never because we had nothing to say, but because we felt the need for short two years. I was very happy. I believe that people who saw us then must have wondered often to see us so long pleased with one another.

I put that down to the fact of our youth. We used to board, and I had nothing to take care of. My husband's love was a sovereign panacea for me in the daily worries, which are the lot of the maiden of our greatest happiness. But it could not last for ever. His business took more of his time, and at last I had a home of my own, and a child to look after. It was then that, for the first time, our mutual patience was tried. All then we find devoted ourselves to one another; henceforth the cares of life often took the whole of our energies. I was the first to perceive the change. It seemed to me that a dark cloud was hovering over me. Sometimes I gave myself up to sadness, thinking that my husband did not love me so well as before. Now, that I look into the past, I am convinced that it was my tired nerves. These hours of sadness diminished my courage, and it was an injustice of what I ought not to have been guilty towards my husband. However, my mind retained from them a kind of dolorous impression, and I felt as if I had been the victim of a serious grievance.

For some time my heart had been bleeding from that wound. I kept all my little grievances to myself, I was too much ashamed, and at the same time too proud, to speak of them. That was my second error.

There can be no happiness in marriage without the greatest mutual confidence. The weather changed and dumps, dumps, dumps! I put in up in a most irritable mood. I had caught a cold, had a dreadful headache, and my child had disturbed me all night. I got up, each one was in an ignorant country woman, and that morning, she served us one of her worst breakfasts. The steak was burnt, the eggs as hard as a cannon-ball, the bread half baked, and the coffee, our greatest relish, execrable.

My husband endured everything till the coffee came, but that coffee put an end to his patience. He upset his cup, and said, half angrily:

"I wish, Annie, that we could have once some good coffee. Why is it never here as at—mother's?"

This was for me the drop in the already filled cup, and my bitterness overflowed.

"You never find anything nice here," said I; and I shudder it at the sound of my own voice. "You would do better to stay at your mother's if you are not satisfied here, or else give me servants who know their business. I cannot do all—take care of the child the whole night, and then cook the breakfast."

"I did not know I was so unreasonable," replied he, in a cooled manner.

He remained a few minutes longer without touching his breakfast, took his hat and went out.

When I heard him shut the door after him all my firmness gave way. I shut myself up in my room, sat on a chair, and began to cry like a very child.

It was the first time I had answered him so. It seemed to me that something frightful was going to happen, and because my husband was so excited, that I actually went round my room wringing my hands.

All is finished between us, thought I; we shall have no more happiness in this world. A heavy shroud covered me from head to foot—the future was all darkness and desolation. In my misery I attempted to pray, but the throwing the whole blame on my husband. "Why should she speak ill to me?" cried I. Could he not see that I was suffering? Could he not divine anything? He pays more wickedness in him. It is evident that he cares no more for me—and then always throwing in my face the example of those people so agreeable, when he knows that I do my best to please him. Oh! it was pure wickedness!

I was beside myself with grief. Just at that moment my child began to cry, and I was obliged to run to him before being able to go through the whole of my doleful litany, but I had gone far enough to find out where I was in the wrong. I began to grow calm at the thought that my husband alone was to be blamed. I was very sorry to have spoken to him so harshly, but I thought that he too ought to be sorry.

Before my child had ceased crying I had taken the first step, and the reconciliation—a tender kiss, too, should show any. I washed off the traces of my tears, dressed with the most particular care, and was all ready to go down to receive—and to let her to pay great attention to the dinner. When doing so I really considered myself to be a victim. I awaited the humble and repent of his injustice, by giving him (as a kind of reproach) as good a dinner as at his mother's: and in order to increase his remorse, I made, with my own hands, a pot of excellent coffee.

One o'clock at last. The door opened, and I heard my husband's step in the hall. He was coming up to me. He stopped on the staircase, without showing the least vestige of the morning's tempest. He threw around him a glance of satisfaction. "Very good dinner, Annie," said he. "I am happy that you find it so," replied I, with the air of a martyr. "This roast is delicious, Annie," he added, this your work?" In short, he was so pleased with that dinner (which I intended as a reproach to him) that he did not even perceive my displeasure. I was at once angry with him and I was glad. I took the proffered peace, my lips to answer him. After the dessert I gave him me coffee. He was quite surprised.

"Why, Annie," said he, "you have made that coffee, my little fairy, to show me what you can do."

I could not proceed it, but without suspecting the intention. My first impulse was to ask him openly openly. "Is it so good as your mother's." Then I thought that I should be ashamed of the sudden anger he would have understood all, and we would have made peace at once. But I was ashamed. I remained silent, and my sudden good-humor immediately slipped away, and my good angel took flight. Pride remained master. I began even to be annoyed to see him enjoy my revenge and forget so quickly that so much he had given me. Having a good deal of business to transact, he did not remain as long as usual; but when he left me I felt more irritated against him than before dinner. I went back to my child, thinking all the time of what I ought to do.

The night was asleep, the rain was pattering against the window, the wind was blowing furiously, and the world seemed to me as black and dreary as the night. I was overcome with the shadows, and now that the excitement was over, and that I felt the reaction, I asked myself what advantage I had gained over my self. I had blamed my husband and not seen that we ought to have made peace. I reproached him with heartlessness.

"Formerly," thought I, "he would have noticed the least alteration in my voice, the thinnest cloud on my goodhumor; now I can be really angry with him, without his being aware of it."

The afternoon seemed to me to have no end. I was excited and feverish. I tried everything in succession; I could sit down to nothing. I went down to see a garden deal farther from the right path than I was at dinnertime. I sat down alone and peevish. My husband tried several times to begin a conversation, but in vain.

"Annie," said he at last, with great kindness, "you are not well to-day."

"Not quite," replied I, with a sigh.

"What ails you?"

"My head aches; the child kept me awake nearly the whole of the night."

It was the truth, but only part of the truth. I felt guilty to utter. He advised me to lie down on the sofa, and offered to send for me. I felt how kind it was of him—it was the good old thing. Although the new time had lasted but one day, it seemed to me endless. But I wanted something else. I wished for a clear explanation, and I wanted to allow him to jump over it; I reproached him with the downfall come to the afternoon, till he should see and feel that after such a misunderstanding I could not receive my former happiness without experience repentance and forgiveness. So I declined the sofa and the reading, saying it was necessary I should go to bed. I let him offer me his arm to lead me with a good fire, just as when he was still unmarried. I went upstairs, laid down and cried myself to sleep. You laugh, Emily; you think that I was mad. You are right. Nor I believe so myself.

"And how did it all finish?"

I walked one week, becoming every day more silent and more unhappy. Then, one day, I could no take my child and cry over him, as if my husband were dead, as if I had but that child in this world. I was unhappy I was sad. And my sadness did something to my burden; every time I saw my husband I found something new to blame him for. Now he was idle and I thought he was not fond enough; one time he talked too much, another time not enough. He bore my ill-temper most patiently, and I believe that he was trying in his own sense to tell me that he had eight days' leave of absence; had hired a carriage, and that I was to pack up quickly, for we should be away in an hour. We were going to my mother's for a week.

"It is better to pay travelling expenses than doctor's bills, my love," said he. "I will not have you to pass another night as the last few days. We shall send old Bridget away, and then no one leave care behind and enjoy ourselves."

I was touched to the heart, and I felt inclined to throw myself on his neck and to cry all my tears, when remembering my odious conduct, but I restrained myself and kept still.

I packed up as quickly as I could. Before having half done, I took the resolution to tell him all, to humble myself, to ask his pardon, and at a time intense weight was taken from my heart. I was as light as a feather. My face, the sound of my voice, all was altered. I knew it, and he saw it also, and he was happy.

"Well, Annie," said he, "I really believe that the mere idea of travelling has cured you; we may stay at home after all."

Such is my story, Emily; the remainder would not be interesting to you.

"No, no, you do not deprive me of the best part of it. Tell me how you made peace."

We got in the carriage, and went on gaily till the child began to feel sleepy. Then my heart was very splendid. Nature was wrapped in silence and quietness, and I envied that quietness. Tears of repentance and love rose to my eyes, and they fell on the child before I knew it. My husband perceived them.

"What I Annie," said he, with the greatest surprise; "are you unhappy?"

"I am so sorry," sobbed I.

"Sorry! and for what, my darling; are you not happy? Are you not with your husband?"

"I am so sorry to have been so wicked the whole week."

"What do you mean?" said he, more and more astonished.

"How should you not know?" and I began by the beginning, and told him the whole story how I had forgotten myself, and answered him harshly when he had told me that his coffee was good, and that I was jealous of his mother's; how that had annoyed me; how he had forgotten it, and had not fallen on his knees, asking for forgiveness; how I had thought of it the night before; how I had thought poisoned my heart and spoiled all my enjoyments; how many tears I had shed when alone, thinking that all was over between us for ever; how I could not love one another as we did love before. He listened to me without saying a word, and then broke in a most tender voice:

"I want to know, Annie," said he, "if that is the only complaint you have been suffering from the whole week? Certainly—"

He stopped the horse, to make him turn back.

"What are you going to do?" I asked.

"To go back, for I think he did not complaint."

I laughed so heartily as himself, for now, that my sin was confessed, I felt very happy. But I pulled at the rein, and made him proceed on the whip, and he started briskly in the direction of my mother's house.

Then we took the resolution never to allow the sun to set on our little misunderstandings, so that we should always be in due peace, if not with the whole world, at least with one another.

We have faithfully kept our agreement. I have never spent another miserable week as the one I have related to you, and I know that I shall never see such a one again.

I hope, Emily, that you will find with Harry the happiness I enjoy with my husband. The best thing for you to do, is that your first quarrel will also be the last one.

ON THE RESTORATION OF FLOWERS.—M. Cabonne, in a note to the French Academy of science, says that when the green parts of plants, under the influence of light, absorb carbonic acid, assimilate, the carbon, and give out oxygen, the colored parts, on the contrary, under the same circumstances, absorb oxygen, and give out carbonic acid. The increase of carbonic acid evolved seemed to increase as the temperature rose, and a growing flower gave out more than a fully blown one.

SHERIDAN'S CAMPAIGN—BATTLE OF FISHER'S HILL, SEPT. 23—CHARGE OF CROOK'S CORPS ON THE RIGHT.—Sketched by our Special Artist, J. E. Taylor.

SHERIDAN'S CAMPAIGN—BATTLE OF FISHER'S HILL, SEPT. 23.—From a Sketch by our Special Artist, J. E. Taylor.

THE BATTLE OF WINCHESTER,

September 19.

At five o'clock on Monday morning Wilson's cavalry division pushed up the Berryville pike, crossed the Opequan, and, moving up towards Winchester, encountered the rebel skirmishers, whom they speedily drove back into the field works erected to defend the ford. The entire division then charged the works, and actually carried them at the point of the sabre, capturing some 30 or 40 prisoners, and thus securing an undisputed passage of the Opequan for our infantry.

Immediately after the capture of the lunettes commanding the ford, the 6th corps (Gen. Wright) moved forward, and pushing up the pike towards Winchester some two miles, formed line of battle, throwing out a heavy line of skirmishers, the artillery attached to the corps at the same time taking up position and vigorously shelling the works in which the enemy had taken shelter.

Owing to different manœuvres and connections, it was fully noon before the advance was sounded, and during this time the enemy's lines had been greatly strengthened, and were formed in a belt of heavy woods skirting the Berryville pike. All this time portions of their artillery kept up a brisk fire, without inflicting any serious loss on our part. When at last everything was ready, the two corps moved slowly but steadily forward. The first line of battle had advanced but a few hundred yards when they received a heavy volley from the enemy, and soon became hotly engaged with the rebels, then some 600 yards distant. Our batteries simultaneously opened a searching fire, pitching shell and shot into the woods spoken of before with great rapidity, and harrassing the rear columns of the enemy and embarrassing the movements of reinforcements, which could be seen moving up.

At this time Gen. Sheridan rode along the lines, and was received with great enthusiasm by the men, and his presence seemed to animate them with renewed determination.

Our troops continuing to move forward, despite the murderous fire of the enemy, they succeeded in getting within 200 yards of the rebel lines, when a furious cannonade broke out from some batteries hitherto concealed, and by their repeated discharges of grape and canister mowed down large numbers of our men. So heavy and destructive was the fire from these batteries that our advanced line was compelled to fall back, thus temporarily deranging the formation of the second and third lines of battle. The order was quickly given for the men to lie down, in order to avoid the effects of the showers of grape that were ploughing through their ranks.

Our artillery was then rapidly brought up and given commanding positions, from which they soon commenced a withering cannonading of the enemy's advanced position, under the protection of which our lines now reformed, again advanced, and after a desperate resistance on the part of the rebels, the enemy were compelled to fall back, and we once more gained the position we had lost. After this achievement the 6th and 19th corps were ordered to lie down in the lines of battle as they then were, in order to await the arrival of Gen. Crook's 8th corps, which was up to this time lying in reserve on the eastern bank of the Opequan creek. Gen. Crook was ordered to take up a position on the right of the 19th corps, with a view to check an expected attempt of the enemy to turn our right flank, who could be seen massing his troops on his left for that purpose. It was nearly three o'clock when Crook formed his line on our right, his second line being in rear of and supporting the 19th corps.

Gen. Torbert, at this juncture, came up very opportunely, bringing with him both Averill's and Merritt's divisions of the cavalry. They had been fighting all day along the Opequan, after crossing that stream at Burn's and Knox's ford, meeting with strong bodies of the enemy, and succeeded in successively and steadily driving everything before them.

Gen. Sheridan now gave the signal for the grand and final charge that brought victory to our arms. Our line, now over three miles long, advanced with long-continued and hearty cheers. The charge was made with a headlong impetuosity impossible to resist.

As our lines pushed on, and drew nearer and nearer to the enemy's position, the battle raged still more fierce, and with a fury impossible to describe. At every volley men could be seen dropping in every direction, and frequently the opposing lines could not have been many hundred yards apart.

As we stood anxiously awaiting the result, the bugles of the cavalry rang out "the charge," and thus began the closing event of the day. Moving out with the rapidity of an avalanche, our gallant knights of the sabre swept on, and thus aiding our infantry by adding their own resistless weight in the furious onslaught then being made upon the enemy's position, succeeded in gaining the splendid victory. This last manœuvre was too much for the rebels, and they were forced to fall back, but still compelled to break before our continued and determined efforts. The cavalry claim to have captured nine of the battle-flags and two pieces of artillery.

Gens. Custer and Merritt were conspicuous for the daring manner in which they led their commands into the charge. Gen. D. A. Russell, commanding the 1st division, was, as usual with that gallant and fearless officer, foremost in the fight, and was killed instantly by a cannon ball while urging on his command.

The shattered and utterly demoralized divisions that go to make up Gen. Early's command now fled in utter rout and confusion, throwing away in their panic their guns and equipments, and whatever they happened to have on their persons. They started in all directions, pushing for the mountains and Winchester, others doggedly giving themselves up as prisoners. Large numbers of the enemy were captured by our forces during this disastrous retreat, and by this means swelled the heavy list of prisoners already in our hands.

As the head of our column reached Winchester, the Union residents, consisting, of course, mostly of ladies, came out joyously and greeted our victorious soldiers with glad smiles and words of warm welcome for the defenders of that flag which they now so triumphantly waved over their heads.

Early's loss was nearly 10,000 in killed, wounded and prisoners, including Gens. Rhode and Gordon killed.

The loss of the gallant old General, D. A. Russell, was our most severe blow.

Our sketches of this signal victory show the operations of the 8th corps on the right and the 6th (Wright's) on the left.

In the foreground of the former are Crook's veterans, advancing to attack the forts on the right, which commanded Winchester, and which they took so gallantly by the aid of Averill's horse. Our men, it will be perceived, charged under the fire of these forts as well as of the fire of the rebels posted behind the broken stone wall and rail fence on the left, behind which may be seen the distant summit of Strasburg mountain, and nearer us the city of Winchester, the former soon like the latter to see Early disastrously defeated.

In the sketch of Wright's corps may be seen our left advancing to drive the rebels into the fort and woods, and then, in spite of their artillery covering the Winchester pike, out again to the west in full retreat.

Nor was this the only fighting. Our centre nobly did its share, driving the rebels from the woods to the right of our second sketch, and when they regained it forcing them again into the deadly grasp of Crook, literally filling the woods with dead.

"I have turned many a woman's head," boasted a young nobleman of France.

"Yes," replied Talleyrand, "away from you."

"Jane, what letter in the alphabet do you like best?"

"Well, I don't like to say, Mr. Snobbs."

"Pooh, nonsense! say right out. Which do you like the best?"

"Well," dropping her eyes, "I like U best."

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

At a recent examination of a farmer, on his sister entering the box to be questioned, the following conversation took place between her and the opposing agent:

"How old are you?" said the lawyer.

"Oh, weel, sir, I am unmarried, and I dinna think it right to answer that question."

"Oh, yes, inform the gentleman how old you are," said the judge.

"Weel, a weel, I am fifty."

"Are you not more?"

"Weel, I am sixty."

The inquisitive lawyer still further asked if she had any hope of getting married; to which Miss Jane replied:

"Weel, sir, I winna surely tell a lie; I hinna lost hope yet." And she scornfully added, "But widna marry you, for I'm sick and tired o' your palaver already."

Speaking of a New York paper, a contemporary says: "Too religious to commit suicide, it has doubled its price, and seeks a natural mode of exit to the other world."

If a pretty woman asks you what you will bet, answer that you will lay your head to hers.

Our griefs are no doubt deeply interesting to ourselves; they are great bores to our friends.

"Did you know I was here?" said the bellows to the fire.

"Oh, yes, I always contrive to get wind of you," was the reply.

Mr. Noggs, speaking of a blind wood-sawyer, says: "While none ever saw him see, thousands have seen him saw."

"Julius, whar did you get dat coat?"

"Down here to Push's."

"Whar's dat?"

"Little ways down in Brattle street, whar it says 'Push' on the door. I pulled dis coat and run out."

THE WOODMAN'S ANSWER.

Air—"Woodman, Spare that Tree."

You bid me "spare that tree,"
Nor "touch a single bough,"
But then, sir, don't you see,
I'm out of wood just now.

You say "your father's hand"
Had "placed it on that spot,"
But now I own the land,
Because I bought the lot.

'Tis beautiful no doubt,
But than it's in the way,
And I will have it out,
For beauty does not pay.

If I should "let it stand,"
A fool I'd surely be,
For there's at least a cord
Of firewood in that tree.

An Enterprising Agent.—An enterprising travelling agent for a well-known Cleveland tombstone manufactory, recently made a visit to a small town in a neighboring county. Hearing in the village that a man in a remote part of the township had lost his wife, he thought he would go and see him, and offer him consolation and a gravestone, on his usual reasonable terms. He started; the road was a horrible, frightful one, but the agent persevered, and arrived at the poor man's house. The bereaved man's hired girl told the agent that the bereaved man was splitting fence rails over in the pasture, about two miles. The indefatigable agent mounted his horse and started for the pasture. After falling into all manner of mud holes, scratching himself with briers, and tumbling over decayed logs, the agent found the bereaved man. In a subdued voice he asked the man if had lost his wife. The man said he had. The agent was very sorry to hear it, and sympathised very deeply with the man in his great sorrow, but death, he said, was an insatiate archer, and shot down all, of both high and low degree. He informed the man what "was his loss was her gain," and would be glad to sell him a gravestone to mark the spot where the loved one slept, marble or common stone, as he chose, at prices defying competition. The bereaved man said there was a slight difficulty in the way.

"Haven't you lost your wife?" inquired the agent.

"Why, yes, I have," said the man, "but no gravestone is necessary; for you see the cussed critter ain't dead; she scooted with another man!"

That man is a thief," said a wag, pointing to a reporter at Guildhall.

"Why so?" inquired his friend.

"Why," cried he, "do you not see he is taking notes?"

"Confusion to the man," as the carpenter said, "who first invented working by candlelight."

"Ay, or by daylight either," rejoined his apprentice.

SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—OUR FORCES AT JONESBORO DESTROYING THE MACON RAILROAD.—FROM A SKETCH BY GEO. D. SAYLOR, 2ND IOWA INFANTRY.

THE TWINS OF THE HEART.

BY THOMAS POWELL.

Two chambers has the human heart,
Where joy and sorrow ever dwell;
Close they reside, yet apart,
Each within her silent cell.
Is laughing joy in hers awake?
For they ne'er awake together,
Sorrow then her rest doth take,
E'en as dark and sunny weather.
Merry-hearted joy, beware,
Lest you rouse your sister sleeper,
Let thy laugh be soft and fair,
Slumber best becomes the weeper.

TOUCHING THE BODY;

OR,

THE MURDERER'S TEST.

A DISTINGUISHED attorney of Baltimore, not long since deceased, with whom I had the pleasure of an intimacy something more than professional, one evening, as we discussed cigars and wine at his table after dinner, interested me with the relation of a thrilling incident in his experience. An atrocious murder had been recently perpetrated in New York, some features of which we had been speaking of, and which led to the somewhat confidential communication of his narrative.

THE ATTEMPTED MURDER OF THE BOY.

"I shall not mention names," he said. But if the reader pleases we will assume names for the convenience of relation:

A Mr. Arthur Norton had been engaged in mercantile business—in fact, a pretty extensive business on Baltimore street, for some fifteen years. He was generally supposed to be wealthy. I had transacted his legal business, and had repeatedly suggested to him the propriety of making his will. His wife had been dead few or five years, and he was left, well advanced in life, and in impaired health, with one son, a rather delicate youth of fifteen years, at the precise time I am speaking of.

One morning I was sent for hastily to Mr. Norton's house. He had been taken ill during the night, and was supposed to be slowly sinking afterwards. He desired me to make his will. Left alone together, he said, that his wealth had been greatly overrated of late by popular opinion; and this I believe to be the reason why he postponed the obvious duty to which he now addressed himself. He enumerated what real and personal estate he possessed, and estimated its entire value at thirty thousand dollars. It realized, in fact, thirty-six thousand dollars. The vicissitudes of commerce, he said, had reduced his gains to that sum. He was confident that he had at one time, only a few years before, been worth at least one hundred thousand dollars. He was evidently very earnest in his purpose to impress me with the importance of this fact.

I drew up the will in accordance with the instructions he had jotted down that morning. After some few legacies to bookkeeper, salesmen, clerks and servants, five thousand dollars were devised to his brother, James, and all the rest of the property to his son, Arthur. He then added this note:

"I do not devise anything to my niece, Margaret, whose love and kindness to me during her occasional visits to my house have caused me to esteem her very highly; but, I hope that she will become the wife of my son, Arthur, who, I believe, loves her very dearly."

I ventured some inquiries on this subject, and learned that Mr. James Norton was a master mechanic in rather a small way. He also was a widower, and had one daughter, Margaret, who was just four months the junior of her cousin, Arthur. I remarked that they were very young to have indicated mutual affection. My client corrected my misapprehension by saying, that he didn't know they ever had. I thought it possible then, that his wish would not be regarded. He thought so, too, but concluded that Margaret would inherit the five thousand dollars left to her father, any way. I was dubious on this point, but the old gentleman was not disposed to discuss the matter, and a clergyman was announced as in the parlor. The will was duly witnessed, I being appointed administrator, and Mr. James Norton guardian of the boy Arthur. The old gentleman died that evening.

Arthur had no inclination to pursue the business of his father, had it been possible. Mr. James Norton knew nothing about it, and it was sold to a very fair advantage. Arthur was then placed at an excellent educational institution, and I heard nothing more of him, till one morning I read a paragraph in the paper stating that he was drowned. The facts were very meagre, the reporter introducing them with the remark, that at a late hour last night he had ascertained that while Mr. James Norton and his nephew, Arthur, were engaged in fishing from a boat in the harbor, opposite Canton, the young man had fallen overboard and was drowned, notwithstanding the prolonged efforts of his uncle to discover and rescue him after he disappeared beneath the surface. Mr. Norton shrieked for help, and finally returned, almost frantic, to the city.

And James Norton is the heir at law, said I to myself as I laid down the paper. I was suspicious of foul play immediately. The truth is, I recoiled instinctively from that man upon meeting him at his brother's house when the will was opened and read. The countenance and bearing of the fellow associated him with the prisoner's dock, from a professional point of view. I did not at the time like the idea of his guardianship, and determined to have as little to do with him as possible. I thought, perhaps, I had been remiss in my surveillance of his guardianship, and might thus have contributed to the boy's untimely fate. But I resolved to spare no effort for the complete elucidation of this affair, and if foul play had been practised, to bring Mr. James Norton to account. So much at least by way of compensation for the past.

I had not breakfasted when the bell rung. The servant entered. "Mr. James Norton wishes to see Mr. — immediately, if possible."

With all my professional experience I felt my blood rushing back upon my heart. I sent word I would see him in five minutes. In those five minutes I endeavored to collect myself for a searching process with this man, to probe his hears, and to convict him of his guilt, if possible, on the spot, and give him into custody.

When I entered the parlor he was pacing up and down the floor. I had determined to seat him with his face in the light of the window, but whether anticipating such an effect or not, without substation even, he seated himself with his back to the light, and left me to choose my position.

"Oh, Mr.——," he exclaimed, directly; "this is a horrible affair."

He seemed to take for granted that I had heard of it. A murderer always believes that the fact of his crime is instantly carried abroad on the wings of the wind. His fallacious hope is, that the perpetrator will be undiscovered. Mr. James Norton's first demonstration was a suspicious one.

"I have just read in the paper that your nephew was drowned last evening while in your company." I determined to be frank with him, and have always found it the best policy in the end. "Was no one present but yourselves—you and the lad, Mr. Norton?"

"Not a soul."

"Nor in sight?"

"It happened just after dusk—almost dark. There was a sloop sailing up the channel and a steamer had just passed down."

"It was very unfortunate that no other small boats were near?"

"There was some up higher town, going in; but we'd a sort o' drifted down rather far."

"Is the accident in the papers a correct one?"

"Pretty nigh. It just happened by Arthur's letting go his oar and reaching over after it. He went down headforemost, missed the oar and never came up. I kept a rowing about for half an hour and hollered, but couldn't make nobody hear, and then pulled up to town."

"With one oar?"

There was the slightest perceptible pause.

"One oar and the sail."

"Oh, there was a sail?"

"Yes; didn't say so?"

"Not before."

"I thought it was my duty to let you know about it from me, Mr.——, and so I called," he said, rising.

He had taken the alarm.

"Keep your seat, Mr. Norton," I said, with perfect control of my voice, though I was deeply agitated. "May I ask whether there has been any indication that Arthur would carry out his father's wish with regard to your daughter?" I resumed, scarcely believing that he would have committed such an act as I suspected him of if the consummation of this wish had seemed probable. The young girl, Margaret, I had been much pleased with, after what little I had seen of her.

"I believe they were getting to be very fond one of the other."

"Does she know of this calamity?"

"She's a-most crazy over it, and has been a raving all night, and saying all sorts o' things."

"Mr. Norton," I said, suddenly changing the point, "could Arthur swim?"

"Not a stroke; he was sort of 'feard of the water."

"How did you happen to know he could not swim?"

"I heard him say so only a few days ago."

"How came he to say so?"

"I—I think I asked him, or—maybe Meg did."

"Try and recollect whether the question was from you or your daughter. These little things may be of some consequence hereafter."

"Why, you ain't agoing to try me, I 'spose."

"Not at all, but every fact will be thoroughly investigated at the inquest."

"If the body is found," Mr. Norton remarked.

"If the body is found."

"And if the body aint found?" and he paused.

"There can be no inquest—no corpus delicti whatsoever."

"No what?"

"No corpus delicti."

"And what's that?"

"No evidence of crime whatsoever; and even though you were to confess that you——"

The bell rung at that moment, and Mr. Norton started as if he had been struck. I did not finish what I was about to say, when he remarked:

"I don't think it's quite fair, Mr.——, to talk to me in that way."

The servant brought in a card and placed it in my hand. It was one taken from my own basket appropriated to the use of chance callers or visitors unprovided themselves. It was my turn to start now—but I did not. But if Mr. Norton had been bold enough at suspicion me, he would have seen I knew not what sort of an expression, besides the pallor of my face.

"Tell the old lady to remain seated in the library, and I will see her directly, Robert."

Robert opened his eyes a little wider than usual, perfectly comprehended me, and withdrew. I talked rambling for a minute or two, and then requesting Mr. Norton to wait till I returned, I went out and shut the door, pausing Robert in the hall, with orders to summon Mr. Norton when he came forth to leave the house. And then I plunged into the library. In five minutes I had arranged the testimony which called me there, and returned to my quarry. Had I a cruel satisfaction in torturing this victim by closing about him, bit by bit, the net in which he was to entomb himself?

I think from the globe and muteous placardings in which detective officers give their testimony, they must revel in delicious glee as they wind the folds about the unconscious one, and the supreme delight consists of the fact that it is unconscious. It was not so with me. Could I have met this man when he first entered my house with a direct accusation of his guilt, I would have done so, and spared him the torture I very well knew was already fastening upon his soul for ever and ever. I have enough now boldly to make the charge against him, but it was still necessary in wring from him the undoubted proof of his guilt.

Upon returning to him I resumed the conversation by speaking of the reversion of the property.

"You are the heir-at-law, Mr. Norton. You are aware, probably, that the whole estate falls into your hands?"

"I supposed as much. I don't like to think about that, though, just now. It don't seem quite decent."

"Very true. Have you considered the possibility, Mr. Norton, of the boy's being alive?" he started again and looked wildly at me—"I mean the possibility of his having picked up?"

He was evidently relieved from the first startling supposition.

"Oh, no, sir—oh, no. There wasn't nothing nigh to us, I told you. I hollered for help, and nobody heerd me. It was a place deep enough to drown him if he had been fifteen foot high, and he couldn't swim. There was at least twenty foot of line on with the killock."

The "killock" is the little anchor with which these small fishing boats are held in position.

"The killock! Mr. Norton," I exclaimed, with some emphasis; "I thought you said you had drifted down?"

His eye wandered for an instant, helplessly; his fingers twitched nervously upon his knee.

"Drifted—did I say drifted? O, yes, after we got the killock up, and while we was a winding up the lines—yes, drifted a little bit down."

"After Arthur went overboard, you think he couldn't have caught the oar?"

He looked almost savagely at me, but paused before he answered me, and then I knew his reply.

"If he had a caught the oar wouldn't he have hollered to me?"

I made no questioning me, you see.

"That might depend upon circumstances," I answered.

"What sort of circumstances?"

"Whether he felt quite sure that he could trust you again."

"Mr.——, I think you suspect me, and mean to insult me. I mean, say, I say; have a care. I shall leave your house now, sir."

I am sure that as he moved towards the door he did not feel quite confident that he would be permitted to do so.

"Where are you going, Mr. Norton?"

"I am going down to the place where the poor boy was drowned, Mr., and going to take some hands along, and grappling irons, to search for the body. I am going to do my duty, sir, you only do yours."

"I have been more prompt with mine, Mr. Norton. The body has been found and already brought to this house."

The man's jaw fell—he trembled in every limb—and reeled against the door. Then recovering himself in a moment or two, he jerked out the words:

"You're joking, Mr. ——, you are a-joking—but yes wouldn't joke now."

"No, Mr. Norton, I would not joke on such a subject as that. The body is here in this house, and is now laid out upon my library table. Will you walk and see it?"

I don't think he could ever have told what answer he made. He mumbled something, and I took him by a firm grasp of his arm, and led him passive as a child across the hall, threw open the library door, entered and closed it. There upon the table, stretched out in unnatural length, with its suggestive outlines delineated beneath the white sheet, it lay before his gaze—nothing but that, and nothing else could be supposed to be the victim. I endeavored to lead him to the body, but he recoiled and detached himself from my grasp.

I then approached it myself and drew the sheet from the upper part of the figure. A single glance at the pale face, the closed eyes, the long lashes, plastered to it, upon the dead-white cheek, and the miserable wretch was completely unnerved. He went to the window and endeavored, with wonderful success, to lift the sash.

"Stop a moment, Mr. Norton," I said. "It were better not to have witnesses from the street of this painful scene, nor to offer any loiterer ear to hear us. In times not very remote, Mr. Norton, it was said that a murdered soul would have some such preliminary presence if he approached and touched the body after death. I frankly tell you, sir, that I suspect you of deliberately compassing this poor boy's destruction, and I expect that his spirit will bear witness from hand upon his heart, and declare, before heaven, that you are innocent of such a design. Will you do it?"

He had partially recovered from his extreme nervous prostration, and hoarsely answered that he would. Approaching with wavering step, but his eyes were fixed upon the opposite wall. He just dropped them as he stood by the table to see where to place his hand, and laid it upon the region of the heart.

"I declare, in the presence of heaven——"

He had drawn back from the body, now he snatched away his hand and rushed from the table, his teeth chattering in his head.

"What is the matter?" said I, as he sank into a chair.

"Good God, his heart is beating!"

"It is the sign," said I. "And look there!"

The body rose to a sitting posture. Norton sprang from his chair to the door, but it was locked.

"Uncle," exclaimed young Arthur, "you would have added perjury in the very face of heaven to the crime of murder!"

Then he dropped from the table.

"I am alive and well!"

But his uncle did not hear these last words. He had fallen insensible to the floor, and it was an hour or more before he returned to consciousness.

"How in the world had the boy escaped destruction?" I asked.

By obeying the suggestion of his own well-grounded fears. He had for some time been troubled with apprehensions of his uncle's designs. He could scarcely define any particular thing to which to ascribe them. His mode did not accord—ages the affection of Margaret for him for one thing, though he knew that they were both well disposed to fulfil the wish of the deceased Mr. Norton. Then a pointed inquiry whether he could swim—could he swim even a little?—followed in a day or two by an almost peremptory declaration of purpose to have an aquatic fishing excursion, flung the lad into a state of feverish, nervous alarm, the cause of which he could communicate to none, for he had no one with whom he could take counsel upon so grave a suspicion, and one which he still fancied might be utterly groundless.

I asked him why he did not come to me, and he replied that he thought of me as the last person he could approach with such an intimation, from very fear that I would be founded, as a lawyer, I should establish the guilty purpose, and so ruin his uncle. There was a charming amiability in the boy's character, and it was enlisted to the last. So he took safe, prudent and timely counsel of his fears, and purchased a patent life-preserving vest of which he had heard, perused, and put it on before venturing upon the fishing excursion. It was infated through an elastic tube which it was only necessary to detach from the inside, place in the mouth and blow into, a turn of a screw in the embouchure retaining the air. He had made up his mind, he said, that if he got safe home without any attempt on the part of his uncle to do harm to him, to abandon his fears, and then exhibit his precaution as the resort of his timidity under his inability to swim.

They had taken some few fish, but they did not bite freely—it was rather early to expect it in fact—but the uncle seemed to linger needlessly and aimlessly as unprofitably, so far as sport was concerned, until night came on, and two or three boats which had been out far from them had withdrawn. The boy observed that his uncle seemed pre-occupied, seldom spoke, but frequently looked all around him, until the twilight obscured observation from any point of the shore or vessel within view. It was at the time that Arthur took an opportunity to detach his vest by occasional inflatments. It was nearly dark when his uncle proposed to take in lines and go home. The boat was drifting in position by the killock. His uncle having occupied a good deal of time in getting in the lines, seated himself in the middle of the boat with his face to the bow, and the oars lying one upon each hand alongside in the boat.

"Now, Arthur," he said, "up killock."

The boy turned and pulled upon the rope, but it did not immediately yield to his strength, when his uncle stepped over the seat between them, and grasping the rope with his left hand, exclaimed:

"Here for a struggle, you!" and at the same moment seized the boy by one leg just above the ankle, and pitched him head foremost into the water. He rose instantly, breasting the water about him and calling for help, that his uncle's suspicions might well have been aroused; but as he found himself buoyed up, and free from any struggle on the part of the boy, he threw himself as flatly as he could upon the less treacherous deep and floated away. He stated that he could not believe that he could himself win a single look after him, for he saw him in a few moments pulling from the spot with the oars—both the oars secured to the rowlocks as fast as he could.

Arthur soon felt himself quite at ease in his new situation, but was soon alarmed to find that he was drifting into the channel, supposed to be the channel, where he might be run down by a steamer, or carried out into the bay. Presently, going with the tide as he was, and in fear of hearing, and perceiving that the light of Lazaretto Point must be within hailing distance, he began to shout for help, and was almost instantly relieved by a response. A boat came off shore, and he was saved. He told the man who had thus aided him, that he had fallen overboard from a vessel, but had forborne to mention the truth as accident by wearing a life-preserving article of dress, gave the man a dollar for his trouble, and walked to town, where he got his own clothes up to dry during the night, and came off to me first thing in the morning, having first forfeited himself with a brief explanation to his cousin, personally brought his body to my house before I had broken my fast. It was Arthur's card that Robert brought to me in the library, and owing to the dark in the in the library, I heard his story in a few words. We instantly improvised the little dramatic scene I have described, and the magical effect, Robert lending a helping hand while I returned to Norton, but to this day ignorant of the parties, the plot, its design and denouement.

"And what did you with the villain?" I asked.

"Well, literally—entre nous—we compounded a felony."

Arthur begged so hard that his uncle might be saved—"He my become a good man, you know, sir, yet—and then there's Margaret," &c.; and so I yielded to the boy's importunities, but on the stipulated upon two conditions: First, that on base a criminal should surrender his guardianship as a matter of course; secondly, that he should leave the State of Maryland never to return to it. Arthur demurred to the last, but I would submit to no other terms, and before we had agreed by the time Norton had come back to his worthless self, when the first use we made of his consciousness was to grovel upon his hands and knees, and beg for his craven life.

He gladly accepted the terms, but neither Arthur nor myself could rely upon the consequences. In the fulfilment of them poor Margaret saw her fears confirmed, and fell fearfully ill. Arthur visited her, and assured her that she was all the world to him, and young as he was he would marry her at once, if she would consent, and banish the idea she entertained utterly from her mind. But he could not honestly deny the accusation, her natural instincts had authenticated as the cause of her father's action, and she refused him and died. I verily believe of a broken heart.

Norton soon afterwards converted all he had into money, and took his departure for California; and in three weeks was killed in a mêlée with the natives of Panama.

"And Arthur?" I asked.

"That is my secret. He still lives."

About three months after this story was thus told to me, I received an invitation from my friend Arthur to be present at the nuptial ceremony of his second daughter, about to be united with a young man who had, by his manliness and persevering student law, in her father's office, and had since his admission to the bar made quite a successful professional debut. As they stepped into the carriage and drove away from the church door—a handsome pair, a beautiful girl, and a tall, intellectual featured youth—my friend whose hand was resting upon my arm suppressed

"A word in your ear—strictly confidential. You've many a slip, &c., consequently when I told you that anecdotal story of mine about the the drowned boy, I did not knew positively that he would become my son-in-law, though I expected it. That is the lad."

SONG.

TAKE me from these dreary shades;
Life me to some softer morn,
Where the laughing light invades
Dark old shores of the dreary bourn.

Which was born when trees were born.

Where the docile winds take care
Not to ruffle any breast,
Lest queen-clouds that pace the air
Should put fond a mirror there
When they stop to gaze, and look.

Where the dazzling nights endure
Till the day has passed its spring,
And where starlight is so pure
That no bird is ever sure
Whether it should sleep or sing.

Somewhere there is never rain,
Never trouble in the air;
Not a breath of care or pain;
Take me to that land again;
I have dreamed I once was there.

NINA MARSH;

OR,

THE SECRET OF THE MANOR.

CHAPTER XVII.—A TRIAL OF STRENGTH.

The wind was blowing keenly from the north, and full in Mrs. Oldnun's face, as she trudged down the road in search of her son. From her lofty observatory she could note all the outgoings and incomings of the village, but she knew when any one had a grand week, and in what state of preservation their clothes remained. She saw many quarrels, a few reconciliations, and an occasional fight. Her lynx eyes were often, too, the scornful witnesses of stolen kisses. She could tell to a nail how many lads sought the convivialities of the Red Lion of an evening; and when Mrs. Sand-se stole in the dusk for a quieting draught, Mrs. Oldnunne all knew it, and grieved piously at such drunkenness and deceit.

"You had the toothache terrible bad last night, hadn't you?" would Oldnun say to Mrs. Sand-se, when she met her the next day in the street.

"The toothache! I never had such a thing in my life."

"Oh, I thought it was that sent you to the Red Lion yesterday for a little drop of spirit," would the wily old woman reply.

Then came a pause, which was broken presently by Dame Oldnun's voice pitched into a soft key.

"Hush! they've killed their own best beautified pig last month. I was wondering if there was any of it left by this time."

"There is a few bits, and my husband sets much store by his pork," says the victim, painfully aware that resistance will be useless.

"I'll pay for what I have by other things besides," answers the dame. "Some men is fonder of a sober wife than they is of pork."

"Hush! there's Dame Oldnun coming," and having gained her purpose, she trudges homewards in high glee.

And it was for these things that dame Oldnun had come; and so considered a person of consequence in the village, and was looked up to literally as well as metaphorically, as a person too high in the world to be officially or colloquially. But her star had been more particularly in the ascendant these last few months. She spoke vaguely of some wealthy relations she went at pleasure, and certainly every wish she formed seemed to meet with rapid fulfilment. She wanted some young women's undergarments, and they came to her as if by magic; and on Christmas day she sat down to as "noble a joint" the neighbors remarked, as any lady in the land.

In the darker ages Dame Oldnun would assuredly have been taken for a witch, and put to all sorts of tests. As she was regarded as something not altogether canny, and there were found people to declare that she had entered the service of His Satanic Majesty for a little consideration. The dame herself rather favored this hypothesis on the ground that it was convenient for her purpose, and even strengthened the delusion by occasionally dispensing charms. She told fortunes, too, in a friendly way, and fetched such wonders out of a tea-cup as all the science of a Newton would have been unable to produce. But to-day the dame contented herself with more simple efforts at divination. She was waiting for her son, whilst the dinner on the board smoked through the open door.

"It's that hussy, it's all that hussy again," she exclaimed with prophetic accuracy, and she gave a spiteful glance towards Woodman's cottage. "No one could be more regular at his meals than Ben was before he took up with her, and now the witches stand mud the fat's like tallow, because he must needs make morning calls like his betters. I haven't no patience with men, and that's a fact. As soon as they get as high as your knee, they must go gallivanting and making fools of their-selves. If we was to make such fuss about pink cheeks as they do, I don't know how the world would get done. I thought Ben was more sensible than the common run, but I see now he was only waiting for an opportunity, for he's took the fever about the worst of anybody I ever saw. And he must be a fool," she added, looking back at the smoking joint; "as if all the talk in the world was equal to that meat when the fat was hot, as all should be."

Dame Oldham's anger almost yielded to compassion at Ben's ignorance and folly. She was about to re-enter the house and begin her dinner without him, when she saw the door of Woodman's cottage open and Ben come out. Rose was behind him, the wind blowing her fair hair about her flushed cheeks, and her great violet eyes sparkling with modest joy. Dame Oldham could even see the flutter of Rose's bodice as it heaved joyously with the quick throbs of her heart. Ben was holding her hand and looking down into her face, and she was smiling up at him with a smile speaking words of modest love. Many a mother would have been satisfied for her son to marry so beloved; but Dame Oldham was not generous by nature. She liked Ben well enough, but he was only necessary to her through her egotism. She could live without him, but she could live better with him, and in a way to get the most pleasure out of her remaining years. This was her sole motive in grudging Ben any of his affection, for this motive was strong enough to make her hate Rose, and look upon her as a person it was natural and legitimate that she should wish to injure.

The dame's wicked heart was bitter within her as she watched the two standing there looking into each other's eyes, unconscious of observation. She doubled her fist, and her keen oil face brightened with some evil resolve.

"Ah, my lady!" she muttered between her teeth, "whilst you're flaunting about I'm working, and it will come hard if old brains don't get the better of pink cheeks."

Pink cheeks are very well in their way, and go further than old brains with some people," said a decided, manly voice close behind her, in which was perceptible the slightest shade of repressed contempt.

The dame turned sharply about, and came face to face with Captain Marsh.

"Ah, it is you, sir," she said, with some show of hostility. "I wasn't expecting the favor of your visit. May I make bold to inquire what you want me for?"

"I'll tell you what I want with you presently," answered Captain Marsh; "but first oblige me by stepping a little farther back. If you have an over the hill-side in that way your head will become giddy, and you will assuredly fall and break your neck."

"Maybe you'd like to come in-doors?" she replied, turning round and going towards the cottage-door.

"No, thank you, I am very well where I am, only it is necessary to caution you about falling. I frequently see you hanging over the village, and have wondered that you never had an accident."

"And if I did, shouldn't you be glad enough? I lay that many people would set the bells ringing, and make a bonfire on the common, if it was to die. I know pretty well how I'm looked on in some quarters."

"You are regarded according to your deserts; but should woman who passes her time in intimidating a sorrowful and defenceless woman, and shouting all her might out of her door, ever to be looked upon with any vast amount of sympathy. This system of intimidation has been going on for some time past, I know, but mind me, dame, it shall not continue."

"Who's to prevent it?" she said, putting herself into a defiant attitude.

"I will, and that speedily. You are darkening my cousin's very life, and I won't permit it."

"People don't say 'would' and 'shall' to me nearly," she replied, an impudent smile crossing her thin, pinched lips. "Haven't you been here long enough to know that?"

"I have been here long enough to learn a great many things, and I will tell you one of them. I have learnt that you are more known than fool, dame."

"Any one could have told you that without your taking the trouble of spelling it out," said the old woman with mocked courtesy.

"That's very probable; but I don't trust to other people's observation and experience, as a rule; I prefer my own. I am more free to act when this knowledge is of my own seeking and finding. In the present case I am simply indebted to my own and care for such discovery I may have made respecting your character, and I give you due notice that I mean to act on the information obtained."

"And so you may, and willing; you can't harm me."

"I am not so sure about that, dame. Old women who are constantly seen prying about people's houses, and threatening these they know to be helpless and sorrowful, are scarcely considered fit objects of charity. Ben gets plenty of work now, but, remember, one word from Mr. Marsh to Sir Barnard Sykes, and he is thrown out of place."

"There's always no good fish in the sea as have come out of it."

"Yes, if you don't mind shifting your tackle. But perhaps Ben would hardly care to leave the village; he might think—there's no telling—that starvation near Rose of the pink cheeks was better than prosperity and plenty elsewhere."

"Yes, he's fool enough for that, I dare say," answered the old woman with irrepressible candor.

"Well, and how would that suit your purpose?"

"I shouldn't starve. I haven't worked my mine clear yet."

"You have, if my influence will hold good," said Cyril, turning to depart. "I have taken the matter into my own hands, so that, whenever you want anything of Ben, you apply to me, and I will give you a suitable answer."

"Does Miss Nina know you are come?" questioned the old woman, as he moved a few paces from her side.

"No; I mean to tell her, but forgot it."

"Well, then, tell her when you get home, and let her know, too, what you did say to her took the mormer grown she gave me for every day wear, and shall want something better for Sundays."

And, with a chuckle of the most triumphant insolence, the old woman made him an elaborate courtesy, and went in-doors to her dinner with an appetite all the keener for the past contest.

CHAPTER XVIII.—KATIE'S CHARGE.

Katie had rallied during the cold, dry winter weather, but when the sharp spring breezes began to sigh through the trees, she seemed to grow more weaker and weaker, whilst her cough troubled her incessantly day and night. The little thin, patient face, so like the dear dead one, grew pinching lips, was a painful sight to them all, though only Cyril realised the full significance of the change.

Katie often spoke to him of her death, but never before the others. Perhaps he divined the effort they were making to shield themselves, and would not undeceive them until the last moment. Certain it is that the child opened her heart to Cyril alone, and that her simple theology afforded a wonderful source of consolation to him.

March had blown itself out and a few milder days had set in. Katie rallied again in order to welcome the swallow, but it was evident to Cyril that her improvement would be merely transitory. For a week her brilliant eyes and crimson cheeks deceived the fondest watcher, but on the first day of April, when the swallows came, Cyril knew that she suddenly sank again into more determined weakness. She did not complain of anysuffering, but her breathing became very audible. Her young life seemed to fade away very gradually and gently. She was perfectly resigned, and, perhaps, even glad at having the heart to be going home to God.

One evening about the end of May they all gathered round her bed. Mrs. Marsh was showing Katie the gorgeous sunset and predicting that she would be well enough to go downstairs and be able to get up and enjoy it. Katie's large hollow eyes had followed her mother's, and her little face was flooded with the crimson light, but she was not thinking, too, of being better on the morrow—better in heaven. At any rate, she had sunk into a deep trance, and could see no more, so that it was of no use to speak to her. Mrs. Marsh was about to have disturbed, and they were silent.

"I wish some one would sing to me," said Katie, presently.

Nina began a few soft notes, then buried her head against the coverlet, and her bosom heaved with suppressed sobs.

Katie laid her thin hand caressingly on Nina's neck.

"You couldn't, darling, I know; but cousin Cyril will."

Captain Marsh bent over her with great tenderness.

"What shall I sing to you, dear Katie?"

"About the weary traveller—I am so weary, and I can see my home, but it is not distant still," answered the child, in a low tone.

His voice softly modulated, but beautifully clear and distinct, Captain Marsh sang the hymn from beginning to end.

When he had finished, Katie gave a little sigh of gentle contentment and closed her eyes.

Then Mrs. Marsh and Madeleine crept softly out —Mrs. Marsh to fetch her knitting, Madeleine to fetch her work. Madeleine's cold, selfish, self-absorbed nature was wearied by the study of a little dying face, but it felt that it owed it to her—she rather wished to be, but she could not remain idle. She had always taught her fingers to be busy when she could be still. It was too late to unlearn the old lesson now, and took her head to work and her fingers to be still. She knew that Katie was going, and she was sorry to part with her; but we think it was the pain she had over her embroidery-frame, with the arduous work of months nearly completed on it, she would have grieved more keenly for her so enduringly.

Meanwhile Nina and Cyril kept watch together at the bedside of the little dying girl. She had seemed to be sleeping, but her eyes soon closed upon Mrs. Marsh and her eldest daughter, Katie opened wide her dim blue eyes and looked wistfully at Captain Marsh.

"You once promised me you would take care of Nina," she said, in slow, faint voice. "You won't forget?"

"No, Katie, I will not."

"And you will be gentle with her, cousin Cyril? I know you will do it, and do it better, too, than any one else could. It was Nina's doing, now, I wanted to live for. Mama and papa love me very much, but then they have other children, Madeleine—"

But here the child stopped and sighed. If she knew how little heart her eldest sister possessed she did not care to talk of it at such a time. But for Nina, who loved her so tenderly, almost naturally. Katie could measure the terrible loss of her presence. Perhaps she realised to some extent how great a safeguard she had been to Nina. Left to her despising thoughts and own most wretched resources, Nina might—we can hardly tell—have sought self-destruction. But this child had saved her simply by her innocence and love. Nina knew all that she was losing, and the plaintive cry broke from her lips:

"Oh, Katie, what will become of me when you are gone?"

"I will take care of you," said Cyril, passing round to the other side of the bed and taking both her hands in his own. "I will take care of you, Nina."

"Yes, against others; but I am my own enemy most of all, and who will save me from myself?"

"My God can do that," answered Cyril, earnestly. "What is in the power of mortal man I will do for you, not only on Katie's account, but on your own. I cannot give any fuller promise, Nina; you must trust me now, that is all."

She lifted up her face and drew closer to Katie. She was haggard and heartstained, but the fatal beauty which had brought her so much sorrow and reproach still kept her company—when it had been absent and forgotten—for the minute, at least, she was so tearful and worn, and yet lovely still, in spite of all disadvantages, Cyril, who had been speaking with brotherly tenderness to Nina, observed the dark-fringed eyes, and whispered, in tone of passionate earnestness:

"Remember that you belong to me—I never gave you up—and shall I be careless of my best possession? Katie," he added, turning to the dying child, "you would like me to have Nina for my own, and hold her, you wouldn't you?"

The girl's face brightened.

"Oh, cousin Cyril, I have always wanted that!" "Then shall it be so?" he asked, and Katie, too, Nina. You need not tell her how much I love her—she knows it well enough already; but you can tell her that the past will be as nothing to me if she will only give me some happiness in the present and future."

Nina gave a startled glance of inquiry up into Cyril's face. But Cyril met it with the same passionate earnestness as before.

"I ask no questions now, Nina. I have grown wiser of late, and I will wait for you to come to me as you are, and let nothing be thought of between us but our love for each other."

"Katie, you hear what he said?" said Nina, in a tone of mingled joy and incredulity.

"Ask Katie," he answered with his most gentle smile. "I know her wishes will be laws with you now, and I have the satisfaction of getting her leave for my silly. She must plead my cause; I have failed so often myself that I dare not try again."

"You will plead for me, dear Nina, won't you?" said Katie, anxiously. "The thought of leaving you is the only thing that has kept me from dying for a long time. If you were with him you would be happy, and he would take care of you, just as he has taken care of me. I should like to think that you could not miss me so very much."

"Katie," replied Nina, with grave earnestness, "Cyril does not know all the promises; but if, a year hence, he should still wish it so much, and I should be free, I will become his wife."

Cyril bent over her again, and whispered softly:

"Nina, do you love me enough to make my hope yours?"

"Katie, tell him," she murmured, burying her head again in the bedclothes—"tell him that I love him with my whole heart."

At this instant Mrs. Marsh re-entered the room, bringing her husband with her. Mr. Marsh walked straight up to the child's bed, and took her forehead in both of his hands.

"Your mama tells me that you seem worse to-night, Katie. Do you feel so?"

"Not worse, papa, but better," she said, her dim grey eyes turned lovingly up to him. "I am nearer to God."

"By darling, we cannot spare you; you must not think of leaving us yet," said Mr. Marsh, with a demonstrative tenderness not common to him. "We cannot do without our little Katie."

"But if God wants me too, papa, I must go to Him, mustn't I?"

"And you are glad to go?" said Mr. Marsh, almost in a tone of reproach.

"Not glad to be leaving you all, dear papa, but glad to be going to heaven. You will come to me some soon-day, and then there will be no more parting, dear papa, but we shall all be happy together."

Mr. Marsh shook his head doubtfully and sorrowfully.

"I think Doctor Oundle should be sent for," he said, presently, not in his usual tone of calm decision. "I don't like the look of the cough at all, matter after all. You feel weak, my love, don't you? But you suffer no pain?"

"I am not quite easy now that my cough is gone. My side used to ache so badly, but it has quite left me, and I feel as if I were going to get well; and I am glad to get well—for papa—to heaven."

"My love, who has put these gloomy ideas into your head? It is quite natural for young people to wish to live, especially when they have so many comforts about them as you have."

"As first I did feel that it was hard to be dying so young, but I don't now. I am quite, quite happy, dear papa. I want all of you to come to me in heaven; and you will, won't you?"

Her faint, pleading voice broke off here, and she fell back, breathless. Nina's head was heaped her moist forehead, and sprinkled some refreshing perfume over she bed. Then Katie lay down, saying she should be better very soon, and Cyril and her self carefully pilgrimage had been short. Katie had learned the blessedness of death, after only twelve years of life. She was better on. There was less of carthly taint to cast off, less stain to wipe away, than if she had lived to a riper age. Katie could go silently to her long rest, and those left behind had no need to grieve as with people for whom the world is dark and cold. It is a better home than any riches could gain for her. Nina and Mrs. Trent passed the night by Katie's bed. Medicines stood in the library adjoining, giving orders that Mrs. Trent should call him if she perceived any change.

CANINE FIDELITY.

An Incident in the Battle of Winchester.

Ons Artist, after the battle of Winchester, strolling over its ground marked by the battle and in the woods in front of the 19th corps, where the most stubborn fighting took place, and the dead by thickly strewn, and the trees, which towered above them, found an incident which he has sketched, and the fidelity of the dog we have often heard. Here was an instance, a fatal wound by a rifle ball, on his back, killed, apparently, almost instantly by a bullet through his forehead, his gun-lock still in his hand, around and but a few feet from him. By his side was his faithful dog. He was true to his master, allowed no one to come near the corpse, the animal, true to his instinct, keeping watch by the dead, waiting, doubtless, for some familiar face to approach.

BRIG.-GEN. D. A. RUSSELL.

Brig.-Gen. D. A. Russell, whose lamented death is at our present writing announced, was a gallant soldier and an accomplished gentleman. He was a native of Washington county, New York. Entering the West Point Military Academy at an early age, he graduated in July, 1846. Ten years of his subsequent life were devoted to operations on the Pacific coast. He was a Captain in the 4th Regular Infantry. When the war broke out he was chosen Colonel of the 7th Mass. regiment. He had the honor to command with much distinction the first brigade that crossed the Potomac into Virginia, under Gen. McDowell. For distinguished services in the battle of Williamsburg he was appointed Brevet-Major in the regular army; passing through the battle of Seven Pines and Fair Oaks, and the seven days' fight with McClellan the 5th Infantry, and subsequently appointed Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel in the regular army for general good conduct during the seven days' campaign. In October of the same year (1862) he received his appointment as Brigadier-General of Volunteers, which was confirmed in the month of March of the following year. He commanded the 1st brigade, 1st division, 12th corps of the Shenandoah in the summer and autumn of 1863, and in the battles in the Wilderness through the fights at Spotsylvania Court House. For his services in the advance to the recent important victory in the Shenandoah valley, where he fell, he received a command in the field corps of the army. Gen. Russell was a man of noble stature and pleasing manners. He was in the prime of life, being but about 40 years of age. His loss will be deeply felt by his companions in arms as well as by the country at large.

NEW MUSIC.

The Musical Host. Nos. 1—9. New York: J. W. Fortune, Publisher, 102 Centre street.

Musical publications have seldom attained popularity because they could not offer any surprises in matter, or novelty in the sheet music of the day. From want of satisfaction in the quality of publications were inferior, the printing gray and repulsive to the musical eye. It is only since bringing merely by poor experience, known under the Musical Host, he still certainly, if it still edited, the picture of a light order, embracing every variety, songs, waltzes, quadrilles, marches, &c., and the selection of the most popular pieces of the day, and especially a series of part songs arranged by R. D. Wilson, that could fail to give universal satisfaction. We have known, ourselves, the first few numbers to be eagerly subscribed from all parts, so that the current number looked for as anxiously as any monthly visitor.

The publisher has on his part accomplished wonders, in this very valuable and artistic form that prepares you for an elegant interior. The paper is magnificent, the print thick substantial, the printing clear and the ink a clear black. No musician, lady or gentleman, can choose a number of the Musical Host, and sitting down to try its contents, will fail to make it a regular visitor.

MAJOR-GEN. SHERIDAN RIDING ALONG THE LINES AFTER THE BATTLE OF FISHER'S HILL, VA.

"AWAY."

My wife had left her home to seek
The glow I worshipped in her cheek,
Like Persian old; my sky had paled;
A letter every day I mailed,
And often said, in cheerful vein,
"The baby slept all night again."

All haltered by her tears and prayers
He staid with me, it lessen'd cares;
If he, the nestling, slept, I knew
My dove would slumber sweetly too;
And as I wrote her me and then
"The baby slept all night again."

One morn he laugh'ed at my side,
Death-sick, and with the day he died,
And day with him. It was my pain
That she I loved be happy still.
So wrote I in my wonted strain
"The baby slept all night again."

But when, in turn, she fondly wrote,
Her pet names musing in her note,
Within talk almost the bed
Of him who slept se cold and dead,
I sat the bitter truth to pen
"He sleeps to wake no more again."

And when upon my breast she lay,
And sobbed her precious blood away,
And grief met grief, while of the dead
We thought, within his narrow bed,
I said, and saw it ease her pain,
"He wakes, to sleep no more again."

MRS. NETTLETON DRIGGS.

BY J. W. WATSON.

(Concluded from our last.)

AND so three years had gone away, and one morning there was summoned in haste upstairs to the bedside of her mistress and friend. For days she had been ill, but within the few minutes that Joey had been side a dangerous change had occurred. The house was in terror and confusion, and within a short time the doctor had told Mr. Nettleton Driggs to prepare for the worst, for if the patient had another convulsion she could only come out of it to pass quietly into another world. And so it was that while the poor young lady did that last mother, and within a few hours after passed quietly into a better world, kissing the streaming eyes of Joey and her weeping husband, and whispering to him with her last breath to take good care of the poor girl, for she was the truest friend and companion she had ever known.

There was, and house full of money mourning and poor Joey, though she had known so much of sorrow and woe, thought that now indeed her heart was broken, and that she never again would find so kind, so firm a friend as she who had just passed away. The material estimation of the dead lady had been shown on the reading of her will, and Joey heard, with loud sobs of regret that she could not do something to express her gratitude for the love that had existed in it, that she was become the personal property of the deceased, and such of her estate as would yield a clear income of one thousand dollars per annum.

So now Joey was, as Mr. Nettleton Driggs informed her, an independent woman, and need no longer so anything for a living, which was meant as a hint to her that she had it in her power to abandon him to the servants and to loneliness, a hint that Joey would not in any way understand, but would act in the same old-fashioned, steady manner, making his home as bright and as happy as she could, when she knew the loneliness there must be in the heart that had loved so calmly and so nightly for twenty years with her who was gone. More than this, she utterly refused to consider herself in any other way than that in which she had come into the house, to change her habits of her dress with her change of fortune, or to do anything but a servant. As to what her future would be, she knew well enough that her beneficentress by doing so she would have her do had she lived.

Whether all this was in accordance with the ways of the world, or whether that world would deride Joey's manner of showing her gratitude, is something unalterable, it is enough that such was her resolution, and though Mr. Nettleton Driggs felt it a duty to show Joey what she lost by not at once accepting up his offer and marrying him while she was yet young, he could not help an inward glow of satisfaction when Joey declared her unalterable intention of not changing her mode of life or her condition, unless he was unkind enough to put her again out upon the world, which was a thing she did not believe in for a moment, and so with this understanding the old life went on, and saving the void made by the death of her friend, there was once more peace and happiness in her heart.

We must move by sequences of three years, and so it was that three years later, upon one clear, frosty night in November, Mr. Nettleton Driggs sat in the neat library of his house, holding a newspaper, in which at times his attention would be given, but oftener to the busy figure of Joey sitting at the table and deeply merged in her housekeeping accounts. Joey, in the six years she had been in that house, had altered much. The childish, and look had almost passed away, and a womanly, self-reliant air had taken its place. But, for all, on her watched the earnest labor of Joey, and then suddenly he said:

"Come, Joey, put away your accounts for tonight, and talk with me. Do you know that this is my birthday, little woman?"

"No!" was her answer, shutting away her papers into her desk at his bidding, "is it so? Indeed we have grown so solemn of late that we forget everything. Sure enough it is the tenth. Strange that we should forget the tenth of November. Once we never allowed it to pass without honors."

"Yes, and to-day I am forty-eight. Think of it, Joey, forty-eight!"

"Just twice my age! and yet it does not seem so much for you."

Mr. Nettleton Driggs looked down into his paper with a rapid wink of both eyes and said:

"Hem!"

"I mean," said Joey, apologetically, "that you look so much younger than you are, and that you are so kind and good, that one would almost say, just to see you with white hairs like a grandfather, rather than with the black locks you have."

Mr. D. winked harder than before, and gave a second glance at the paper.

"Indeed you know that you don't look over forty, and everybody tells you so," Joey continued, "and if for one don't believe you're ever going to grow old."

Mr. D. smiled a gratified smile, and cast a sort of side glance into the mantel mirror.

"Well, Joey, I'm glad you think so, because it may serve to make what I am going to say more reasonable to you."

Joey looked up in his face curiously, and drew her chair closer to his.

"You know me well enough to know, little woman, that I would not propose anything that should be thought purely selfish, and yet I am going to be selfish enough to propose something that should prove you also to be selfish with me, for though I have seen you send away two, yet I am afraid, Joey, that the right one was not among some that I and carry off my little housekeeper, and so leave me to die an old man alone."

Joey had drawn closer and closer, and now sat holding the hand of Mr. Nettleton Driggs, and thinking of the day, six years before, when he had saved her from a fate perhaps worse than death, and wondering how he could ever have been guilty of so much ingratitude. And yet all the word she could say was:

"Never! never!"

"It is to insure this, Joey, and to know that I can give a legal and indisputable title to the one who will have all my worldly goods when I am no more, that I speak. Do you know what I shall say, Joey?"

"No!" answered Joey, slowly and wonderingly.

"I am going to ask you to marry me," said Mr. Nettleton Driggs, looking earnestly into the upturned face of Joey.

There was no start, no withdrawal of the hand, no clouding of the face or turning away of the eyes. The proposition came as something which Joey as would a flash of lightning, and yet in an instant she saw it all, she saw the unselfishness that dictated the offer, she saw the love which indeed plead guilty, and with just ten seconds for consideration, she placed her other hand in his, and with a calm, quiet light glowing in her eyes she answered him:

"I will."

"I thought nothing less than this answer, Joey, when I should ask you, but believe me when I say that though it has always, since the death of my wife, been my intention to leave you all I possessed, yet until this day I never thought of saddling it with such a burden. It is not yet too late, Joey. My will is made, it is unalterable if you refuse the burden, but before he disposed of you become my wife, to describe you as such. Speak again, while there is yet time, will you have the old man and his money, or will you not as a condition, but as a self-chosen burden?"

"With all my heart and soul!" and Joey sprang to her feet, and standing before him, looked down and gave and received her first kiss, and lay weeping in his arms.

Oh! yo who would have romance at the expense of reality! Such was none in this. There is no romance in the thought of a beautiful woman, young and loveable, giving herself with such sudden and hearty will to a man who was old, stout and unloveable, save only in such beauty as the heart can see, and yet it is wondrously real.

Seventy-seven days after, a wide and hearty stare when the fact was announced, but as Mr. Nettleton Driggs had little to do with society, and Joey little, the world, in a few months, ceased to cast its eyes or its tongue were matters of little consequence; and therefore one day when, in the presence of Mr. Nettleton Driggs's friends, they were all gathered in the parlor calm, and beautiful, in which was just what Mr. and Mrs. Nettleton Driggs wanted.

They must take a long sweep over the life of Mrs. Nettleton Driggs, and come down to quite a little over twelve years after the quiet wedding at which society was disgusted, and brunket ourselves to a beautiful cottage on the outskirts of a village, well known for its fashionable reputation, and not many miles from the city of New York. Another thing there was about Marion Cottage that at a glance showed its occupant not only a person of wealth, but beyond the size of the house occupy it of infinite taste. In a room of this cottage sat two ladies, the first, if attentively counted up, would, though in neglige, yet still with quiet and decisive individuality; the second, a young woman, who showed that she made no pretension to fashion, but rather bore the air of one who, though brought up in the city, had long enough left a country life to lose her early habits.

"Indeed, you've been a fortunate woman, Mrs. Driggs, very fortunate, I may say," was her remark to the other.

"Fortunate! Mrs. Dalton. You have strange ideas of the application of the word if you can attach it to me. I look upon my entire life as made up of sunshine and shadow, but the shadow largely predominates. The very part which you esteem fortunate and on which you congratulated me is the bitterest of the whole."

"Bitter!" exclaimed the elder lady, abridging her shoulders. "Bitter! upon my word I should esteem it anything but bitter to marry a man as old and as rich as the late Mr. Nettleton Driggs, and have him called away after seven years, leaving me everything he was worth in the world. Why, my dear, he was twice your age!" and Mrs. Ebenezer Dalton knitted away on the crochet with a vigor that showed she was in earnest.

"And he was the best man that ever lived!" answered Mrs. Nettleton Driggs, with strong emphasis.

"Oh, oh, oh! my dear! The best man that ever lived! Only think for a moment. Isn't that very decided? The best man that ever lived, my dear, in your estimation."

"I mean, Mrs. Dalton, that he was true and honest in very thought, in every word and deed. He was honest to a fault, when every worldly policy would have taught him differently. He was the first and last true man I have ever seen, and I know I lost him! I lost what can never be replaced in this world."

Mrs. Ebenezer Dalton coughed deprecatingly and for a few moments was silent; then, recovering herself, she said:

"Well, well, we can't all agree upon the merits of a case, and so let us change the conversation, or, rather, you and I will go on good terms with all the world to-day; for, as you have heard, I am momentarily expecting my son home. Just to think of it, my son, my own son, and only coming back a major, when he went away a lieutenant, and a second lieutenant at that! When you talk about good men and true, I believe that ever lived, my dear Mrs. Driggs, you must let me say something about my son!"

"He must be indeed a most estimable young man, Mrs. Dalton, if I am to believe only half of all I hear in the village; and a brave one, if half the newspapers tell the truth."

"I shall only tell be truth! Why, they don't tell half. And then he is so handsome, too! Indeed, I assure you that one-half the ladies of the place are dying with love for him, and he not yet twenty-one! Why, he'll be a general before another year goes over his head!"

"And a fine major really such a lady-killer, Mrs. Dalton?" said Mrs. Nettleton Driggs, laughingly. "I've heard so much of him from a score or two of ladies in the village, that really I almost fear to meet him."

"Lady-killer!" answered Mrs. Ebenezer, tossing her head, with a world of scorn, indeed, "I only say for him that he never gave encouragement to any of them. He was very courteous and always kind, but he don't make love to any one, Mrs. Driggs."

"I am sure that if he is the brave man he is represented, Mrs. Dalton, he never will trifle with an honest love, even though ill bestowed."

"Then you are a fortunate woman. I have no doubt curiously about it, because she could scarcely realize that a woman who was so uniformly the object of Mrs. Ebenezer Dalton could have such a paragon of a son. There was something about Mrs. Dalton that Mrs. Nettleton Driggs instinctively felt about being the last to assign any reason for that dislike beyond the fact that in the face of her new acquaintance there was an expression of hardness, and of a want of the proffer-seems of friendship, and something that jarred up pleasantly upon the new even tenor of her life, which she could not dismiss by reasoning or argument. Mrs. Ebenezer Dalton, Mrs. Nettleton Driggs's own will, Mrs. Ebenezer would never have been allowed to cultivate an intimacy or have become a visitor at the house; but by the positive manner and pertinacious force of the latter lady had succeeded, and scarce a day passed that she did not come in for her crochet, her gossip and her shadow into the presence of Mrs. Nettleton Driggs.

In the cheerful at Marion Cottage the Joey of Mrs. Driggs was gone, and even the most detective intellect of society would have failed to see in the elegant woman of thirty-six the plain, quiet, yet loving Joey who had once held so humble a position. The beauty was all there, but cultivated by education and travel; for the unambitious Joey of the days of Fair Isaac Gardner Driggs knew something more was expected of her than as the foundling or the housekeeper. It was with this thought, and with the determination to lead the life of her husband, that she had devoted herself to an attainment of those accomplishments, real and superficial, that would enable her quietly to take her place in that society to which her wealth would entitle her. A few years more and she burst upon the delighted eyes of her husband, not only as the fair beautiful woman of his knowledge, but one of high intellect and accomplishment. All this was due to him, and yet never less the fancy of Joey that she was ungrateful; belief that he was that which would be best for her, and at the same time most the approval, if she could overlook it, of the dead, he took the greatest girl to the head of his house and the whole of his heart. Seven years had the fond and never-forgetting wife made his home a path of perpetual flowers, and when, after a long illness, as though for a last treat of the young wife, he went forth to join the army of the dead, his parting words were, that in her he left his world, and nothing else to regret.

A year after this the young widow, yielding to the earnest pressing of friends and her own desire, had joined them to go abroad, and had remained three years in Europe and the East, coming back with all the brilliancy a contact with the world could give her, and yet never forgetting the long past and her charitable. This was now the lady of Marion Cottage, so named by her in remembrance and honor of its donor, the kind mistress and earnest friend.

One week later, and Mrs. Ebenezer Dalton, with a sharp smirk of satisfaction, rushed into Marion Cottage to announce the intelligence of the arrival of Major Frank Dalton.

"And now, my dear Mrs. Driggs, you must let me present him in me dutiely—yes, immediately," said Mrs. Ebenezer, with emphasis. "I am so anxious you should see him, and I am so anxious he should see you; for you know, my dear, confidentially, that you are the only one in Middleville that any sensible person would give a straw to know. Indeed, I hope you will like the major as well as I know he will like you. Now, can I bring him right up this morning?"

Mrs. Nettleton Driggs smiled at the eagerness of Mrs. Ebenezer, though something there was about it that grated harshly on her sense, and after a moment's consideration compromised with her anxiety by consenting to receive the young man that afternoon. The afternoon came, and with it Mrs. Ebenezer and Major Frank Dalton, the last a bowling, brown, dark-eyed, well-formed man, looking at least five years older than represented by Mrs. Ebenezer. He was a gentlemanly looking man, and one that duty did not proceed from any attempt to show it or any consciousness of its existence, but rather from the natural and unaffected bearing of thorough-breeding intellect that spoke out of his really good face. The prejudice from which Mrs. Nettleton Driggs had been unable to divest herself, when considering Major Dalton with Mrs. Ebenezer, vanished in an instant, and when she arose and gave him her hand it was with an asking of pardon in her heart for the injustice of which she felt she had been guilty, and perhaps it was to offer some reparation to her own conscience for the injustice that she resolved to make herself over the usual reserve with which she always met the other sex, and treated him as an old friend whom in she had not seen for long absence.

Weeks passed away, and Major Frank Dalton's furlough was within a day of its close. The gossips of Middleville were terribly excited over the discovery of the young and handsome paper in Marion Cottage, and were exactly indignant, especially those who had marriageable daughters, at the fact that the major was a widower, who made the purpose of marriage or flirtation, try to enchain the affections of one so much younger than herself. Indeed, they declared that it was monstrous, and the idea that his mother could not only countenance him in it but should really show a high opinion of the match, was the last drop of bitterness that had occurred to shock the proprieties of Middleville since the Rev. Ralph Peabody, the Presbyterian minister, had gone off, despising all the remonstrances of his indignant flock, and married a plain and not handsome country girl, to whom he had been engaged long before he had accepted his call to Middleville.

As we have no secrets from the public, though for the present we intend to keep some from the parties most immediately concerned, Mrs. Ebenezer Dalton, who, though feverish with desire to know all that passed at Marion Cottage, would not spoil by her presence the interview which she did know would culminate to her wishes better without her, we will introduce it to that day before which Major Frank Dalton was to leave Middleville.

A few happy weeks had they been at the cottage, not only to Mrs. Nettleton Driggs and to Major Frank, but to the charming Bertha Lee, who, almost since the death of Frank's first love, had been the companion of Mrs. Nettleton. Charming was Bertha Lee, so said Mrs. Nettleton Driggs, and when well-educated to display to advantage any matter of taste, even though it were a question of taste with regard to women? Bertha Lee was a niece of Mrs. Nettleton's, one whom she had watched almost from her birth. Bertha's mother had been one of the few friends of her past, one who had, in a long-seen scene of her early life, shared the rich family of Driggs, treated the Joey of the past not as a servant, but as an equal. When the mother died, after the little Bertha had reached the age of seven, over that Joey bore for the mother was transferred to the child, and Bertha became almost as her own. When more years had glided away, and Bertha became an orphan, the care of Joey increased, and only excepting such time as was imperative to be spent among the relatives of her father, for the new mother always. Together they had studied, travelled and lived, though nearly a score of years separated them in age, they were more companions and equals than in the relation of mother and child. Bertha was eighteen; Bertha was blonde, fine-eyed and fancy-formed, a being that shadowed out more than the age and a grace of cultivation in her movements.

This day they were all together in the garden of Marion Cottage, the gossiping, serious and silent than usual, for each had thoughts running riot through the brain, thoughts that each dared not speak. Frank Dalton in the last happy weeks had revelled in a delight of such association as he had never before known, and now he was about to tear himself away from the Eden of the Field.

"—— with a most voiceless thought,
Sheathing it as a sword."

And he sat gazing in profound silence on the two beautiful women, so entirely unlike, and yet so loveable each. To the beauty of each, the one an opening bud, the other a flower full blown, a paid full homage, but it was the older that led the heart and brain of the young soldier captive; and yet, notwithstanding the admiration such as he had never felt for woman before, Major Frank could not persuade his judgment that its true expression would be in asking her to become his wife. Beautiful as she was, beautiful alike in body and mind, there was something to the young man that forbade such love, and yet love her he did, in spite of all instinct and all philosophy. And farther, he felt that he could not quit Middleville next day, perhaps never to return, without a word that should leave a record of that love, and yet how was it to be spoken? And she, as though reading through the light covering of words, could look into his heart and know what she feared, and knew that upon that day would come some expression of it, and like a subtle diplomatist, admitting the same love to the almost boy at her side, sought only those words and actions that would discourage it, and for ever still any mention that such intention was in his heart, or any reciprocity in hers. And yet they would talk, and that talk of love. It was Bertha speaking.

"Believe! what necessity shall there be for credibility? Do not women always believe in love? What is it that makes the charm in woman but her belief, her confidence, the very confidence that sometimes is her destruction?"

"For which be she ever blest, and even though that confidence be her destruction here on earth, it will make an angel of her hereafter!" said Major Frank.

"You are speaking with that very confidence," said Mrs. Nettleton Driggs, "which simply argues that the love in which you are such perfect believers, is a thing not of a lifetime, but of certain years of our lives, and cannot be expected to last for ever. We must all love once, as we all must be afflicted with sickness."

"Oh, shame! shame! cousin," for so Bertha Lee had always called her friend, "what romance is there about you, that you should talk of the grand passion in such words?"

"The most sensible of romances, a romance founded upon fact. What sympathy has the world with love when it comes late in life. It is only with the boy and girl we allow our feeling to be enlisted, not with the full grown man and woman."

Major Frank looked earnestly at Mrs. Nettleton as though he would look to her very inner heart, and there read the dictation of her words.

"And by that," said Bertha, "you hold that one should not love after they have reached a certain age."

"Yes; they should not love in the general worldly acceptation of the term. Love we must, always, as I love you, Bertha, as I love a child, or a dear friend, but the love of our youth, never."

"And pray," said Bertha, laughing, "my lady philosopher, will you tell us at what age it is our duty to leave off loving?"

"Certainly," answered Mrs. Nettleton, gravely, "at my age. I should hold it a weakness, if, at my age, I surrendered my senses captive to the passion and reckless love of my youth. Ah, well, you may laugh, lady-bird, when I say 'at my age,' but I am no longer young, and I hope too sensible to represent myself so."

"And then," asked Major Frank, slowly, and with his eyes fixed searchingly on her face, "we must understand you that you will never love again, either with the love of your early days, nor yet with the more subdued and refined passion of the later time—must we not?"

"Without a moment's question!" was the answer firmly given.

"And do we understand from this that nothing will induce you ever to marry again, or will you dispense with the love, and marry purely on the philosophy that it is not good for man to be alone or woman either?" was Bertha's query.

"Your first proposition is right. Nothing will ever induce me to marry again."

There was a slight quiver on the lip of the young man as these words were spoken, and he turned away for a few moments and stood absently plucking the roses from a near bush, and throwing them upon the ground. The smile passed away from the face of Bertha the instant she saw the serious air of her friend, and silence for a time rested upon the whole party.

The next day Major Frank Dalton went back to his regiment, but not until he had undergone a rigid questioning from Mrs. Ebenezer, bearing upon his status at Marion Cottage, a questioning that only resulted in a confused conclusion in that lady's mind that all was right, and prospering according to her wishes, a conclusion that became almost a certainty when the Major gave notice of his intention to resign from the service, and take up his residence once more in Middleville.

A few weeks went by, and Frank Dalton was no longer Major. He had returned to Middleville to find Marion Cottage empty, and its tenants flown to the city for the season, and to the city accordingly he bent his steps, leaving all Middleville to gossip and sneer over the coming marriage of the young man to the woman of thirty-six. There was little love lost between Mrs. Ebenezer and Mr. Frank Dalton. As far as the strict duty of the young man went, it was faithfully done, but there was none of that demonstrative affection that follows the relation. It never was shown or cultivated by Mrs. Ebenezer in the past, and her love for her son now only seemed to ooze out in boasts of his superiority, and of her own superior management in bringing such a son out to the world. Thus it was little confidence existed between them, and as a consequence that Mrs. Ebenezer knew about as little as the rest of Middleville regarding the progress of his wooing, though allowing her hopes to address her belief, she felt satisfied that everything was going well and that at any moment she might hear the announcement that he was about to marry.

And so truly did it fall out, for before the coming of the new year, and within three months of the time of his return, a letter to Mrs. Ebenezer from Frank announced his engagement and approaching marriage. Others followed, finally stating the day, and though correspondence between mother and son had never been either voluminous or cordial, a sincere and affectionate request for her presence, if at no other time, at least at the ceremony, which was to be only in the presence of a few, and would be at the house of Mrs. Nettleton Driggs.

Mrs. Ebenezer graciously announced her intention of being present at the ceremony, but declined coming before, on the plea that perhaps her presence might be embarrassing to the lovers, a plea that was accepted by the interested parties without a murmur. It was strange with this lady that now when her hopes were upon the very point of realization, she was so silent. From her lips the gossips of Middleville never received the slightest intimation of the affair that was so near consummation, those who were close observers afterward declaring that during those weeks that intervened between the conveying of the intelligence and the marriage, Mrs. Ebenezer seemed especially silent and nervous, resisting all efforts to draw her into conversation upon the subject on which she was wont to dilate with so much confidence. So apparent was this, that the good gossips all mentally concluded that the expected match was a failure, so that when within a few days of its actual coming off, they were startled by the intelligence leaking out some way, they all felt that they had been terribly wronged in not having longer notice, and turned upon Mrs. Ebenezer the full ire of their tongues.

The party was gathered within the cheery walls of the good old Second Avenue mansion, the guests, all told, numbering not half a score, were present, and the clergyman ready to perform his solemn duty. The time had passed a full two hours, and all, from the bride down to the waiting servants were becoming weary of expectation, for Mrs. Ebenezer Dalton had not yet appeared, though she had been expected the night before. The streets were white with the heaped snow to several feet in depth, and the clank of the shovels told that it had but just ceased. It was only after many consultations and the truthfully arrived at opinion that Mrs. Ebenezer had been stayed upon her journey by its great fall, and the consequent stoppage of travel, that they proceeded, and the tying of the knot that bound two together for life and death, was consummated.

While this was proceeding Mrs. Ebenezer was laboring by hard stages, along with some hundreds more, into the city, almost twenty-four hours behind time, impeded by the fearful drifts that had covered rails and consigned cars and locomotives to an immovable mass, and two hours after the conclusion of the ceremony, made her appearance, gaunt and pallid, before the startled guests at the wedding breakfast. Her entry at the door was followed by a general rising, and Mrs. Nettleton advanced quickly towards the haggard woman with words of welcome, but was in an instant astounded to hear Mrs. Ebenezer, with hands outstretched to repulse her, hiss out fiercely:

"Stand back!"

Mrs. Nettleton was paralysed for an instant, before the burning eyes and threatening tone of the woman before her, but immediately recovering herself advanced, and once more the same shrill voice spoke.

"Stand back, I tell you! Don't put your hands on me, for your life!"

"Mother!" cried Frank Dalton, springing forward; "what does this mean?"

"It means compensation," answered Mrs. Ebenezer, turning swiftly upon him. "Are you married?"

"Yes!" and the young man would have instantly followed with some words of apology for not longer awaiting her coming, but was stopped by the shrill laugh of his mother.

"Married! Ha! ha! ha! A nice and proper marriage," and then coming closer to Mrs. Nettleton, "let me give you joy."

The one addressed started back and a pang like death shot through her brain. Something there was in the words, or in the tone, or in the eyes that glared so terribly into her face, that brought a sensation of sickening fear over her heart. Once more Mrs. Ebenezer spoke.

"What does it mean? It means revenge! It means the heaped revenge of a lifetime! I would have been here to see the act done, to see you both swear those oaths that should perjure and debase you before all the world, but I was too late. But—I am not too late to congratulate you. Married! Ha! ha! ha!"

"Mother!" said Frank, wildly, "what has happened to you, that you should act so? What is this?"

"Don't call me mother!" shrieked the woman; "I am no mother. You are not my son! God never cursed me with children! Look!" and she pointed toward Mrs. Nettleton with the vehemence of a stab, "There stands your mother!"

A shrill scream from Mrs. Nettleton Driggs rang through the room, and in an instant she was clasped in the arms of Frank, who had sprang forward to save her from falling.

"Woman!" screamed Mrs. Ebenezer, taking from her reticule and holding before the eyes of Mrs. Nettleton a tattered, pink child's dress, "Do you know this?"

With one grasp the other caught the little garment from her hands, and staggering to the sofa, covered it with hysterical kisses and tears in a moment.

"Yes, weep, weep tears of blood, woman, over that memento of your crime. It was I who stood ready upon that day to relieve you of your burden. I who traced you from spot to spot that I might watch for my revenge. It was I, who when you deserted your child in the streets, caught him away and kept him through all these years, not because I cared for the brat, when on his face was marked the features of those two whom I most hated of all the world, but because I would make him an instrument in my hands for your punishment, whenever the time should arrive for it. I little dreamed then of how long it would be, or that it would come to me in the shape it has; but the fiend always helps its own, and so it was that in spite of all disguises and all your silence upon the past, that I knew you, and so was enabled to scheme out my vengeance, and by one blow ruin not only yourself, but his and your brat at once. You know me now, woman, eh!"

And as she stopped for an instant, the features of Margaret Stone glared out in such distinctness that Mrs. Nettleton wondered vaguely how she ever could have seen her, even once before, and not have recognised one who had been to her memory a lifelong terror.

"You know me?" she continued, "and now you know why I have suffered you both to go on in your unholy love, and to leave you to your unholy wedlock. This is my compensation, my revenge has been blessed!"

"Did you believe that I was wedded to my mother?" asked Frank, advancing towards her with a countenance of horror, and speaking in a low choking voice.

"Did I believe! Fool! Do I not tell you that she whom you have just married is your mother?"

Frank turned, and led Bertha Lee forward.

"This is my wife. Do you mean to say that she is my mother?"

"Your wife!" gasped Mrs. Ebenezer; "your wife! Were you not married to that woman?" and she made another point like a stab towards Mrs. Nettleton.

Still holding his wife by the hand, Frank advanced towards Mrs. Nettleton, and taking both in his arms, he said:

"Mother, wife, let us thank God that we have passed through peril unscathed. Mother, that we have loved without passion, and with a love that will endure for ever, and wife that we have loved upon a belief in that calm second thought, that leads the heart instinctively to the real harbor of its rest."

And those three, forgetful of all around them, embraced in the very fulness of their happiness, and then turning to see her who had, intending to do the reverse, brought it all to them, she was gone.

Yes, Mrs. Ebenezer was gone! A glance had shown her how the scheme of her life had miscarried, and she slid quietly away, never more to be heard of in her haunts of old, nor to make her whereabout known even to her most intimate gossips of Middleville.

Our story is told, and we have only to verify its happy end by looking in at any time on one of the most contented family circles in the land, now filling the Second Avenue mansion of Mrs. Nettleton Driggs.

GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Philip Henry Sheridan, to whom the country is indebted for the great triumph at Winchester and Fisher's hill, is a native of Perry county, Ohio, born in the year 1831. He was graduated at the West Point Military Academy in July, 1853, and at that time entered the army as a brevet 2d Lieutenant of the 1st United States Infantry. During the years 1853, 4 and 5 he served in the Indian campaigns in Texas; and in July of the last mentioned year, after serving a few months in command of one of the forts in New York harbor, he was ordered to California. Engaged for a while in the Government railroad surveys on the Pacific coast, he was detached from that service to take part in the campaign against the Indians, in Oregon Territory. In the severe campaign, under Major Raines, he greatly distinguished himself, and was highly praised by his commander for gallant and meritorious conduct in the fight at the Cascades of Columbia, April 28, 1856.

For the part he took in the settlement of the Indian troubles in Oregon Sheridan was very warmly eulogized by Gen. Scott, then General-in-Chief of the army. Just after the breaking out of the rebellion he was made Captain in the 13th infantry, and served for several months in St. Louis as President of a Military Commission convened at that place. In December, 1861, he was made Quartermaster of the army of the Southwest, then operating in Southern Missouri, and afterwards in Arkansas under Gen. Samuel R. Curtis. He remained with that army until after the great battle of Pea Ridge, in the spring of 1862, when he was appointed Chief Quartermaster on the staff of Gen. Halleck, then in command of the army before Corinth.

In May, 1862, he was offered and accepted the command of the 2d Michigan cavalry, and from this time he was in his proper element, and his great merits as a soldier in active field service were rapidly developed. Three days after he assumed command (May 30) he fought and defeated a considerable body of rebel cavalry near Corinth. In 11 days after this he was entrusted with the command of a brigade of cavalry; and on the 1st of July he vindicated the choice of his commander by fighting and defeating a rebel cavalry force of nine regiments under the notorious Chalmers. This action was so brilliant that it won for him the star of a brigadier. Thus in a few months he won his way by sheer force of active and meritorious service, from the rank of major to that of general officer. In September of the same year he was given the command of the 3d division of the army of the Ohio, then operating under Buell in Kentucky. He fought his brigade with distinguished gallantry and success in the severe battle of Perryville in October of that year; and again, with still greater distinction, under Gen. Rosecrans in the victorious Murfreesboro' campaign in December, 1862, and January, 1863. His services at this time were of such distinguished merit that he was made a Major-General, to date from December 31, 1862. From that time his career in the Tullahoma, Chattanooga and Chickamauga campaigns of Gen. Rosecrans, in the Chattanooga and Mission Ridge campaign with Gen. Grant, and in the great campaign of the army of the Potomac commencing in May, 1864, all the time as a most accomplished and successful General of a corps of cavalry, is still so fresh in the memory of the people as to render more particular mention unnecessary.

His dashing expedition to the rear of the rebel lines near the Wilderness, in May last; his destructive foray on the Virginia Central Railroad, in June, and his almost ubiquitous operations against the enemy, with the splendid cavalry he had imbued with his own soldierly spirit, made him the terror of Lee's army in the early months of the campaign.

In all his various employments, whether as a subaltern in an Indian campaign, in the difficult executive duties of the Quartermaster's office, as the Colonel of a cavalry regiment, as the General of an infantry division, as the General of a cavalry corps, or in the higher and more responsible position of commanding General of an independant army, in the field, Philip Henry Sheridan, now Major-General, and Brigadier in the Regular Army, has shown himself a most thorough and accomplished soldier.

The author of "Down in Tennessee" thus describes the popular hero of the day:

"At the close of our discussion a singularly quiet, unassuming man, in plain pants, loose, blue sack and everyday boots, entered the room and took a seat on the window-sill, by the side of Stanley. He was below the medium height, slightly built, with closely-cut hair and beard, and a dark, sun-browned face. There was nothing about him to attract attention except his eye, but that seemed a ball of black flame.

"'How are you, Phil?' 'Good-morning, Sheridan,' greeted him from various parts of the room, and Garfield, turning to me, said:

"'Mr. ——, this is Gen. Sheridan.'

"It was the youngest corps commander in the army, the man who, when McCook was routed, stood so like a wall at Stone river; who led the desperate assault on Mission Ridge, and has recently made the brilliant cavalry campaign in Virginia.

"'Do you remember Pope's 30,000 muskets and 10,000 prisoners?' asked a young officer near me.

"'Yes; very well,' I replied.

"'I took the muskets and Sheridan took the men. How many were there, Sheridan?'

"'I don't remember,' answered the quiet General.

"'Well, I remember the muskets; they counted 930—not one more or less.'

"'I was with Pope at the second battle of Booneville,' said another General, 'when Sheridan rode up and reported 65 prisoners. 'Why don't you say 500?' said Pope. 'Because there are only 65,' said Sheridan. 'There ought to be 500—call them 500, any way,' said Pope; and 500 they were, but not in Sheridan's report.'

"A general laugh followed, but the quiet hero said nothing, and in all I saw of him afterwards I never heard him speak disparagingly of any one."

BATTLE OF FISHER'S HILL OR STRASBURG, SEPT. 22.

Gen. Sheridan, after routing Early on the Opequan, near Winchester, did not by masterly inactivity allow the rebel General to recover from the stunning blow. He seems to believe in following up an advantage. Early retreated, pursued by Sheridan's cavalry, and the Richmond papers, which at last reluctantly admitted the defeat at Winchester, consoled themselves with the assurance that Early had taken post at Fisher's hill, a strong position from which Grant and his army could not dislodge him. Richmond breathed more freely. There had been defeat but no disaster. Even north those who knew the ground, but could not see how completely the morale of Early's army was destroyed, anticipated a long and stubborn battle at Fisher's hill. It is situated about two miles southwest of Strasburg on the valley road, and its base is washed by a stream called Tumbling run. Here Jackson in 1862 held Fremont at bay till he got his prisoners and train out of the way. The hill is almost inaccessible on the north, and rises like a wall from the run. Here Early was posted on the 22d, with his right upon the Massanutten mountain, and his left upon North mountain, having his front covered by strong natural and artificial defences.

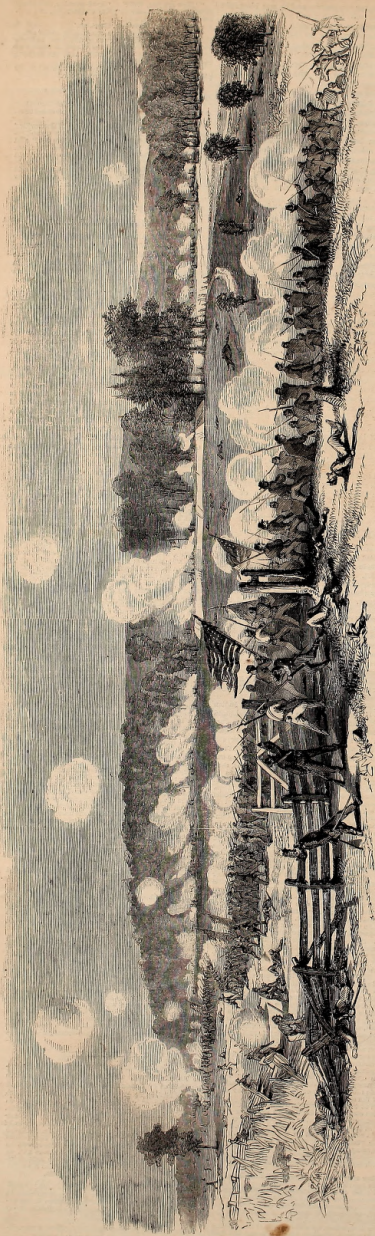
On the 21st Wright's corps gained an important position on his front, and next day Sheridan made a demonstration against Early's impregnable right; but the main attack was on the centre and left. In the centre Rickett's division of the 6th corps advanced and secured some important heights in front. Early alarmed at the vigor of the attack on the centre and right lost heart and began to withdraw, but Early had not penetrated Sheridan's plan of battle. About noon Averill's cavalry drove the enemy from his advance on the left, into his mainworks, after which Crook, who had been kept out of view, pushed up and gaining steadily, about five furiously attacked the left of Early's line, doubled it up and advanced down their line; Rickett's, well to the front, swung in and joined Crook; Getty and Wheaton followed, and Sheridan's whole force was soon in full possession of the enemy's works, driving them like sheep. The rebels threw down their arms and fled in confusion, abandoning most of their artillery. 20 pieces and 1,100 prisoners, with caissons and ammunition, falling into our hands. Sheridan is no boaster, but he cannot help saying, "I do not think there ever was an army so badly routed;" and the men who were thus beaten were the veterans whom Stonewall Jackson had so often led to battle in this very valley; who should have been inspired by past victory. But as a rebel colonel was brought in, he threw down his sword, "The Confederacy is gone to hell; the men won't fight, and more neither will I."

If it has come to this that Virginia officers and men, who are sufficiently Northern to show themselves on all occasions the best heads and hands in the rebel army, begin to give up the cause, how long could it hold out with the discontented North Carolinians, the effete men of South Carolina, Alabama and Mississipi?

Our view of this important and decisive battle shows the town of Strasburg in the foreground. The Shenandoah is seen on the outer edge of the town and the Manassas gap railroad in the foreground. On the left of the town is one of our batteries, and the line of pickets run from it. The rebel picket line is further back, and near are seen Newell's and Hammond's barns destroyed by our shells. On the woody hillside opposite the imposing edifice in the centre is the rebel battery belching away. But the chief interest is further to the right. From the Round hill signal station a succession of batteries were at work. Almost directly in the rear of Widow Kendrick's and Banks's old fort was the rebel front which Sheridan drove them from at half-past two o'clock, and held. While Crook and Averill, pushing through the woods near North mountain, on the extreme right, came bearing the whole line along for the rest of the corps to join him in the chastisement.

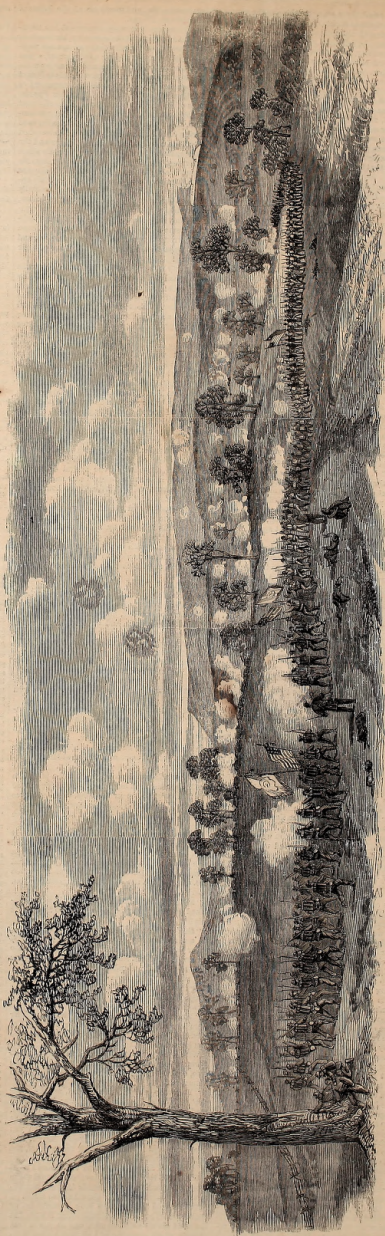
SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

Our Forces Destroying the Macon Railroad at Jonesboro.



Jonesboro, or Jonesborough, is a little place in Georgia, of which one of our occasional Artists gives us a sketch, with a view of the method in which the rails of the Macon railroad were treated to prevent further use.

Jonesboro, it will be recollected, is the spot to which Hood, completely bewildered by the manœuvreing of Sherman, sent Hardee with a good part of his force, and on which the wily General immediately marched with all his army except one corps, and, attacking Hardee, completely routing him, so that Hood had to evacuate Atlanta. To prevent the rebels from using the Macon road, Sherman's soldiers were at once set to destroying the road. The effectual way in which it was done is shown in our cut. Two posts were firmly planted, and after the rail had been heated redhot in the centre, on a fire built on the road of sleepers and ties, it was placed between these and a number of men, who tugged away at one end till it was well bent. Once cooled, it was of no use except to melt.



Mr. Oscanyan has again resumed his Oriental Entertainments, those animated and attractive descriptions of Turkish life, so full of instruction, and accompanied, as he ingeniously has rendered his, with full costumes of various personages, cannot fail to instruct all. Teachers could not select a better entertainment for their schools. It is to the young better than a volume to see the Turkish dress, the mode of eating, receiving company, the Turkish bride, the Druse woman, with her Scriptural horn, &c. In thus recommending it to instructors of the young, it may well be inferred that we can assure all that there is not, as some seem to suppose, anything that the most fastidious could object to, but much that all who have not visited the East will hear and see with profit.

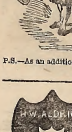
Punch to Dr. Felix Gouraud,

High Priest in the Court of Venus.

MOST ESTEEMED DOCTOR—The fame of your wonderful discoveries, which have realized all the dreams of the alchemists and the enthusiasts of the Rosy Cross, and which mentioned Tyre in that you have revealed to the terror mysteries of the production and preservation of the Beautiful, has spread far and wide among our female worshippers and subjects. They have directed us to convey to you, in behalf of the consecrated States of Beauty throughout Europe, their heartfelt thanks for your magical Cosmetics and preparations, by the use of which women renews her empire, defies the approaches of her ancient enemy, Time, and proclaims loudly how happy her ancient reign, for you, Oh Felix the Wise, therefore, do we extend the good right hand of fellowship, and pledge you our Royal Oath. Long may we both continue to reign in our respective realms—you presiding over the empire of Beauty, while we direct the sparkling sceptre of Wit and Mirth—controlling them, in conjoint and pleasant harmony, the mingled and mighty destinies of man and woman.



Thine, in the bonds of Royal Brotherhood,

Punch.

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is essentially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds purporting to be wholesome, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known then, that while all the diffusive stimulants and flavors of spirits, and all the tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery irritation, corroding the coats of, and, in several points, HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these stimuli, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, anti-bilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales today are equal to the combined sales of all the other bitters advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its merits are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Perry Davis's Vegetable Pain-Killer

Derives much of its popularity from the simplicity attending its use, which gives it a peculiar value in a family. The various diseases which may be reached by it, and in their first stages eradicated, are among those which are peculiarly fatal if suffered to run; but the curative magic of this preparation is no charm known of their service. In all respects it fulfils the conditions of a popular medicine.

Jeff Davis.

"What, though the field be lost? All is not lost."—Paradise Lost.

A WAIL of despair comes up from the heart of Georgia. It is the voice of a drowning man among the breakers. It is the cry of the master-spirit of the rebellion, flying from one danger to another, and calling in vain for a rescue.

We refer to the remarkable speech of Jeff Davis, delivered to the citizens of Macon, Georgia, on the 23d of September last, and reported, entire, by private telegram to the Macon Telegraph and Confederate of the 24th. As an exposition of the desperate extremities of his "Confederacy," we do not wonder that it has shocked the sensibilities of the leading Southern rebel journals; as an appeal for help it evidently comes from "the last ditch," as it is a review of the prospect before him—thet of a man reduced to bankruptcy.

He leaves the imperiled city of Richmond to arouse and encourage, by his presence, and to strengthen, if possible, the bands of his imperilled lieutenant in Georgia. And what is the burden of his appeal? Desertions from his armies on every side. He tells the people of Macon that sooner or later Sherman will be compelled to retreat; that it will be the day comes, our cavalry and our people will harass and destroy his army as did the Cossacks that of Napoleon." But then comes the inquiry—"How can this be the most speedily effected?" Davis answers—"By the absentees of Hood's army returning to their posts." Here is the weak point, the fatal confession—"the absentees of Hood's army." Alas! thousands of them can never be recalled; but there are other thousands who will bear this despairing cry and will not come. They have had enough of e contest which promises them nothing but death or exile to themselves and ruin to their families, and they have abandoned their master's hopeless cause. Of the extent of these defections he makes the remarkable disclosure that "it is not proper for me to speak of the numbers of more rebel soldiers in the field, but this I will say, that two-thirds of our men are absent, some sick, some wounded, but most of them absent without leave." The most of these absentees are soldiers, struggles of desertion "absent without leave," are not to be found. Does not this testimony abundantly confirm all that we bear from the camps of Grant and Sherman, and the demoralization of the rebel armies, and of the daily increasing desertions from them? Southern bayonets are beginning to think, for the truth is beginning to reach them.

What is the remedy proposed? Davis visits Georgia to try by moral suasion to reclaim these absentees, "but," he continues, "if, after conferring with the governors of States, quarters, if there be any other remedy, it shall be applied." This means that Hood's soldiers still remaining on duty are to be somewhat extensively employed in scouring the woods, swamps and country for their absconding brothers. Was there ever a more ghastly mockery than this of men "fighting for their rights?" But these demoralized absentees must be hunted up, for says Davis, "you have not many men between 18 and 45 left." His reserves are exhausted. His wasted armies can now be recruited only from his legions of dissaffected runaways. A dismal picture he draws; and in his efforts somewhat to lighten it, he bewildered Moloch of the rebellion only darkens it into a deeper shadow of gloom.

He tells the people of Macon, after promising the expulsion of Sherman back into Tennessee, cut down to a "mere body-guard," that "the city of Macon is filled with stores, sick and wounded," and that "it must not be abandoned when threatened; but we must defend it, instead of retiring upon Hood's army for defence, the old men must fight," showing that even Macon is not considered safe against the Yankees. Again, says Davis: "I have ordered reinforcements from Virginia to Georgia," but "in Virginia the disparity in numbers is just as great as it is in Georgia." In other words, it is here pleaded by Davis, in his own defence, that the fault of Hood's rebel army are both urgently in need of reinforcements, each to too weak and sorely pressed to render any assistance to the other. Thus from the rebel chief himself we obtain the plain confession that most conclusive proof of the masterly and irresistible military combinations of Gen. Grant.

The quotations we have given from this exhaustingly confession of Davis at Macon, of his forlorn condition, are sufficient, we think, to satisfy the intelligent reader that the days of the "Cotton Confederacy" are numbered. We cannot, however, dismiss this remarkable witness without touching upon his testimony in reference to the dismissal of Gen. Joe Johnston, and the appointment of Hood for the defence of Atlanta. Davis says: "I know the deep disgrace felt by Georgia at our army falling back from Dalton to the interior of the State. But I was not of those who considered Atlanta lost when our army crossed the Chattahoochee. I resolved that it should not be, and I then put a man in command who I knew would strike a manly blow for the city, and many a Yankee's blood was poured out before the prize was won." This evidence from his own mouth is exceedingly damaging to Davis. He goes out of his way to cast disgrace upon Joe Johnston, a General who has no superior in the rebel service, except Lee. "A manly blow!" What were the results? A loss of 25,000 men to Hood, killed, wounded, prisoners and deserters to our lines, the loss of Atlanta, the destruction of vast stores of ammunition, and depots of supplies, amounting in value to millions of dollars, all or most of which, men and materials of war, Johnston would have saved to the rebel organization, for he knew the strength of his adversary. He knew, too, what Davis, it appears, had not the sagacity to comprehend, that Sherman's game was not so much the capture of Atlanta as the destruction of Hood's army, which was very nearly accomplished, through the folly of Davis in his removal of Johnston.

"When the Gods would destroy they first make mad," with this fatal madness has surely fallen upon the remorseless despot of the South. In his rage, confusion and dismay, he permits his personal resentments to overrride the dictates of prudence. He is blinded to the real issues in his own camps, instead of seeking to beat them. He is a bard master, and Gen. Joe Johnston, among his officers, is but one of thousands who must now be wearied of his thankless service. There yet, however, may be something of charity to his people in preparing them for the worst. This may be the redeeming object of his Macon speech. We cannot divine what other motive could indice him to betray his weak and vulnerable points, his doubts, his plans and his purposes, his disappointments and despondency, so far as to convince even his admirers that he is in the hands of a prodigal who has wasted his inheritance, and of a ruler whose cause is lost.

Summary of the Week.

GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—NORTH OF THE JAMES.

On the 1st Oct. Gen. Birney (10th corps) sent out a reconnoitring force consisting of two brigades of infantry, a brigade of cavalry and a section of horse artillery, which penetrated within two miles of Richmond. The rebels retreated to their strong inner lines, which are manned by militia and raw recruits.

The rebels were about to make a flank attack on the 10th corps, but not on Birney's advance.

On Sunday, the 2d, they, however, made a furious attack on the 10th corps pickets, but were driven back, pell-mell.

Gen. Birney has made his position so strong that the rebels seem to give up all hope of carrying it.

Desertere come in daily.

Between 6 and 7 o'clock on Friday morning, Field's division of the rebels, after marching all night on the York river turnpike, fell on Kautz's cavalry division on the Central road, where it was protecting the flank of the 10th corps. Kautz held them at bay two hours, but at last gave way in disorder before the superior forces of infantry and cavalry, leaving 4 cannon in the field. At the same time Hoke and Hooker's division advancing down the Central road took him in flank. Col. Sumner, after the stampede of Kautz's force, kept back the enemy for two hours, till Birney, rising from a sick bed, formed his line.

At ten o'clock the rebels attacked his line, hoping to push him back and assail our rear. For half an hour they rushed repeatedly on Birney's work, but at last gave way in confusion, leaving Gen. Gregg in our rear. Gen. Gregg is wounded.

Birney then pushed on, and his infantry reoccupied the works held in the morning by Kautz's cavalry. The enemy, however, retreated.

Birney himself was on the field directing the movement.

In Richmond the panic increases, and it is now proposed to free and arm the slaves, as though they could be depended on to fight in order to perpetuate the bondage of their masters. The report in the army of the United States feels that every blow he strikes is one for the liberation of the Southern slaves.

SOUTH OF THE JAMES.

On the 1st our lines were advanced three quarters of a mile. A reconnoissance was made by a division of the 2d corps to the Boynton road, where strong works were found.

On Sunday our cavalry recaptured 500 prisoners.

SHERIDAN'S CAMPAIGN.

Sheridan's cavalry penetrated to Staunton and Waynesboro', destroying the iron bridge at the latter place, throwing it into South river, also the bridge of the Virginia Central and the railroad from Staunton to Waynesboro.

The rebel cavalry, however, made a dash into Ebenzburg, between Wolfpitch and Mount Jackson, and burned the bridge there.

A report comes that Sheridan has defeated Longstreet, Early's successor, but we have no details.

GEORGIA—ALABAMA—TENNESSEE.

On the 8th a severe fight took place at Allatoona, in which the rebels were heavy, but after a severe contest, during the fighting the rebels retreated to Dallas, leaving 1,000 of their number dead and wounded on the field.

Hood's army, with the whole army north of the Chattahoochee in Sherman's rear, and has entrenched himself strongly. His troops, according to the rebel papers, have recovered their spirits and discipline.

On the 4th they took Big Shanty, and began to destroy the railroad, but on the 5th Gen. French attacked them, and after a severe engagement drove them out. They, too, left their dead and wounded.

The rebels hoped much from Forrest's movements, but he is closely invested. Major-Gen. Sherman is at Athens, with Gens. Granger, Rousseau, on his front, from Nashville; the gunboats on the Tennessee cover his front; Stedman and Newton are on his rear. Morgan has already captured the transportation, and if he escapes at all, it will be with no power or mischief.

The desperate state of affairs in the Southern part of the Confederacy cannot be exaggerated if we credit Jeff Davis, who says two-thirds of the army are absent without leave.

The western department command has been put in command of the department of Georgia and Tennessee, and the department of Alabama, Mississippi and E. Louisiana, thus controlling Hood and Dick Taylor.

WESTERN VIRGINIA.

Gen. Burbidge, with 2,500 men, recently made a dash into Southwestern Virginia, and captured prisoners and stores at Saltville, but finding a large force under Breckinridge and Echols in the vicinity retired.

TENNESSEE.

Gen. Gillem defeated the rebel Gen. Vaughan at Carter's station, Greene county, driving him out of on entrenched position.

Vaughan retreated to Zollicoffer.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The rebels are expecting an attack on Wilmington.

SOUTH GEORGIA.

Further exchanges of officers have taken place at Charleston, and the rebels have permitted stores sent by the Sanitary Commission to the Union prisoners formerly at ..... to enter the lines.

LOUISIANA.

The rebels admit the defeat of the rebel Col. Scott and the occupation of Clinton by the Union troops.

MISSOURI.

Missouri is in a frightful state. Gen. Ewing, after a gallant defence at Pilot Knob, made good his retreat. The rebels then plundered the town. At Potosi Major Walker and many of his troops were murdered in cold blood after surrender. The whole path of the rebel forces, regular and guerilla, is marked by blood and ruin.

PRICE'S RAID.

Price is moving on Jefferson city, pursued by Mower and A. J. Smith. His course, like that of all others, is marked by desolation. But they seem to seize men with avidity to force them into the ranks.

TOWN COSSIP.

We have just left a friend in the street who has entered upon the last day of grace with a lugubrious easy upon the uncertainty of all things human, based upon the fact that he had a mortgage alone laid in his family seal at the rate of $14 a ton, and that since it has fallen to the ridiculously low price of $10, he does not see how he is to pay it over after he brings it, he was joyfully congratulating himself on his foresight in providing himself with his winter's fuel at—as he declared—one half what it would be about Christmas. "It's these confounded greenbacks, don't you see, my boy? you can never tell what you're worth or to pay for coal." Since that time gold has fallen 33 per cent, and everything has come down by the run, and as a consequence our friend, who has had sufficient faith in his native land to endorse its currency, is out and injured to the extent of from 25 to 30 per ton on his winter's coal, all for a want of loyalty and general confidence in loyalty in the present Government, but in the absolute stability of the currency.

Pursuing this subject, it seems strange to us that in the midst of a terrible civil war we actually see nothing of it about us here, in this city, but the reverse. Well, we see men recruited for our armies; by whom? Why, by bounties and promises. We see the city to big per cent. upon the transaction that enables them to get an able-bodied man in the service of the country. We see the same afterwards re-enlisted and again in the possession of his large bounty made a subject for every imposition and overcharge that can possibly squeeze a penny from him. We see drafting and substituting for substitutes and volunteers; supervisors and town agents haggling for every their quotas filled and their town bonds cashed the same as they would bargain for a team of horses or a herd of cattle. We see contractors gaining double prices for the lowest articles that they may clear cent. per cent. on their engagements, and then crying aloud in the highways that they were ruined from the hard terms of a partial and work. In a word, though the nation is doing its work and fighting out the greatest struggle the world has ever seen, still it cannot avoid giving way to the bargaining, dickering habit of its youth, and turning things of even the most solemn import into a matter of trade.

As connected with this, our prediction of last week that the fall in gold would not seriously affect the prices of the necessaries is verified. As the currency appears to have made an ineffectual struggle to somewhat bring down the price of gold, the effort was too much for human nature, and was abandoned. Gold has recovered, though with a terrible sense of fluctuations, making, at the close of the week, from 108 to 200. The speculators, figuring on the basis of 200, are all buyers, and the shopkeepers, encouraged by their action, hold a hard front. Rents are falling in some parts, but are getting magnificently on the fall of value.

The fact is we are all up to one in which nothing will be much longer felt, seen or tasted but politics. A subject on which, for the last two years, not one single person of sense has differed, for that time agitate them to the very heart. The country, will, in less than a month, by its votes, either confirm its present rulers or know off an entire party to "seek another." During that time a cannot will be fired that will seal the solemn fates of a great nation, and decide the life or death of perhaps a quarter of a century.

During this struggle every eye is turned to the centre seats, while the minor party groups are forgotten, without attracting the slightest attention. Taking advantage of this, the small groups, with their main object in view, at periodical turns of bargain and sale, quarrel and fight and, finally, the combination of the whole, in that stupid donkey, the public, stands by with an animal look of astonishment, and sees the spoils come to be distributed, such as Sheriff, County Clerk, Supervisors and others, worth only from $2,000 to $5,000 per annum, and the question to be settled is not whether the nation shall be saved or not, but what has he to be done for his party, how many friends has he got, and what will he do if that magnificent income will not suit his party purposes, and who will he call in to assist him in the struggle? This is the history of the last century of politics in New York, and now voters have nothing to do but to put the same order of the nursery into practice on the belief that they cannot fail to hit upon a thorough knave, and that he will be honest enough—by honest men, and vote for him.

The thing is that we have foreseen and spoken of several times in the past, has come to pass, a combination of employers against employees. In the present case it is the latter who have made the first move in the country, being nothing less than a resistance to the reduction of wages. Seeing that the cost of necessaries have been for a year or two in a fierce ferment, consequent upon the financial strikes, they have demanded and their demands have been acceded to readily, by the employing classes, with a view to avoid disputes. The employing ladies have rebelled, and declared it an imposition to be compelled to proceed with business under the circumstances. They claim that their consequent gains are falling rapidly away before the rising prices and overcharges a claim that we do not believe in, for the simple reason that the ladies are never the first to sell as now or were more or less, and that workmen's labor instead of falling, instead of rising, which it ought to assert) the universal downfall of all commodities. Under this claim they have combined, and actually refuse to employ any striker, nor yet any member of the Journeymen Tailors' Union, unless they guarantee that any person wanting new clothes, must wait until they get ready, and that as a single person in each case it stands, and not in the slightest degree in a likely way of satisfactorily being done. Of course, a check to the case will be of no consequence; it is a point of honor, as they say, to be firm, and must be so for a few weeks will bring forth, and do not feel inclined even to think about them, let alone write about them in any serious. Let the employing tailors wait until the first cold snap, and it is very shortly on us now, and they will soon be convinced that the people are alive and not to be frightened even at $100 for an overcoat.

Among the wholesale dealers this striking for higher wages is of little consequence, just now, as there is literally nothing doing. Those employed on Government work are pitching lustily along, but all else waiting. In the meantime there are many who cannot wait, but must go, if not one way, the other, by backing down. The last week has brought forth some heavy failures, and several instances such as we know in the panic of 1857, the sudden changing of wholesale houses into retail, and the attempt to force great quantities of goods, principally old stock, on a public that is not inclined to buy.

One of the most interesting exhibitions to visit that New York produces is the meeting of Police Commissioners at the Headquarters in Mulberry street, where our law enforcers, the police, are brought to trial and tribulation for law breaking. We have taken some interest in the matter for a few weeks past, and our conclusion is that it would be hard to take the same number of men from the average number of our citizens and find that they could be charged with a like number of offences. It may be that citizens do not have the same temptation to commit assaults, accept bribes, pick up unconsidered trifles and neglect their duty, as the members of police, but if they do it speaks terribly ill of the general morality of the force. The proceedings of the last week have developed assumptions of petty power that should condemn some of these gentlemen to the working of Mr. Seward's little bell, and shown a mutual spy system at work in their midst that makes it a most desirable thing for a respectable man to be a policeman.

Now, then, for something about the salt of our lines—music and the drama.

Maretzek has had full swing the past week, and unless he is insatiable must be more than satisfied with his success. To this time the promise of new operas, for which all New York is waiting, as it is waiting for sundry other things, has not been fulfilled, but we have had the new company, and as far as our hearing goes, there is no dissatisfaction. In saying this we do not speak of the "opinions of the press," but those of the people. To speak first of the prime donne, for the company is a double one. Signorina Carozzi Zucchi, who made her debut on the first night, is a grand personal presentment of the tragic muse. She is of tall, fine figure, and imposing, strong and refined features, with rich, dark, fiery eyes. Her voice, which she manages with artistic skill, is powerful and smooth, and her youth throws an inexpressible charm over all she does. On the stage she is self-possessed and gorgeous, and summed up will make a mark on the operatic history of New York that will not easily be forgotten.

Brambilla is almost the reverse, and somewhat on the fairy order. She is pretty both in figure and face, and runs into the style that New York is fond of making pets of. Her voice is sweet, good in the upper, but unsteady in the lower. She sang in "Traviata" with the new tenor-robusto, Massimilliani, who was so exceedingly robust as to completely overshadow the little Brambilla.

There is a story going the rounds that our opera season will be cut short, or not repeated, from the fact that Maretzek has yielded to the golden seductions of the stockholders of the Tacon, and will pass, presto! into Cuba somewhere about the conclusion of the eighteenth night. It seems strange that New York and Brooklyn, combined, cannot bring about a permanency of opera, with all the wealth, taste and fashion in their midst apparently willing to patronise it.

One of the principal features of the week has been "Martin Chuzzlewit," at the Olympic. The piece has been cut and redressed from the commencement, until now it is in capital working condition, and as a skilful putting upon the stage is worthy the attention of every manager in the land.

Another feature is the production, at the Winter Garden, of "The Comedy of Errors," with Clarke as one of the Dromios, a Mr. Fawcett, of Philadelphia, doing the other. Not to speak of the improbabilities of the play—which we do not believe was ever written by Shakespeare, and possibly never seen by him—it is unfit for the stage, simply because the outrage offered to common sense is not compensated for by the fun. Mr. Clarke was capital (he can hardly be anything else), but to our mind was kept in continual check by the weakness of his opposite. The play has been a great success and is still on.

As good news to the little folks, we announce that the Hippotheatron opened during the week with a strong company of tragic and comic horses, clowns and gymnasts; and as bad news, that this week closes the little Thumbs at the Museum, and is the last chance to see the General and his wife, prior to their final retirement to domestic felicity.

MUSICAL.

A PRIVATE concert was given last week at the residence of Mrs. Hilliard, on Staten island, under the superintendence of Ardavani, which passed off in the happiest manner, and despite the unfavorable state of the weather was very fully and fashionably attended. Ardavani, who is a baritone of the true old school, gave the music of Rossini with great power and delicacy, and was much applauded. Madame D'Angri sang the Rondo from the "Cenerentola" splendidly. Mozart's exquisite "Vedrai Carino" was sung by Mrs. Hilliard very charmingly, and won considerable favor. Maccaferri, Weinlich and Miss Allan also contributed their full share to the enjoyment of the evening. Goldbeck played a very fine arrangement of the favorite airs from "Faust," with considerable spirit. Altogether it is very seldom that a private concert passes off so satisfactorily as the one we are recording.

We ought to mention that Mrs. Hilliard is an amateur, which renders her excellent vocalization the more remarkable.

NEW MUSIC.

TOM THUMB PRESENTATION POLKA. Rochester: G. H. Ellis.

This is a very pleasant piece of music published by that most enterprising of men, G. H. Ellis, of Rochester. The title-page is very handsome, being graced with the splendid sketch of the ceremony at Ellis's store, taken from Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

WELS'S CHURCH MUSIC. By CHARLES WELS, Organist of Christ Church, New York.

This is an entirely new collection of sentences, chants, hymn tunes and anthems, designed for the Protestant Episcopal Church.

It is intended principally for quartets and skilled voices, but will be found a very pleasant companion in the social circle, and to the young organist we can recommend no better book for study and practice.

The selections embrace arrangements from the gems of ancient and modern masters; and the whole work is remarkable for its freshness and beauty. The book cannot fail of giving great satisfaction wherever it becomes known.

BOOK NOTICES.

FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE AND GAZETTE OF FASHION. October, 1864.

This monthly visitor comes in all its attractiveness, dazzling the ladies by the brilliant colored fashion-plate and its almost countless variety of illustrations of dresses for all occasions, bonnets, fichus, jackets, paletots, corsages, ceintures. A full-size cut pattern for a lady's overcoat is also given.

The description of these is not all that the "Gazette" gives. Its pages are a full record of fashionable dress changes at home and abroad, and give our lady friends all that they can desire to dress well and understandingly.

The literary department of the "Magazine" is very attractive. "The Story of the Stone Eyes," "The Rector's Will," "Our Bet," "An Hour in Janet Rye's Life," all illustrated by artists whose reputation is world-wide, give a most delicious reading. The minor articles are no less interesting, and the illustrations all most attractive.

THERE is a dull ring about a bad piece of coin, as there is about the moon in hazy weather.

CHARITY may gush forth from the hardest heart, like silver water from the rock.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Secretary Fessenden has issued proposals for 40,000,000 of 5-20 bonds, 6 per cent interest, payable half-yearly in gold.

—— On Friday, Oct. 7, a solemn funeral service was held in Trinity Church, New York, for James M. Hopkins, one of the choir of that church. He was accidentally killed by the discharge of his own gun, Oct. 1, while shooting at Newport, R. I. He was a youth of remarkable beauty of mind and body, and was beloved by all who knew him. He was in his 16th year.

—— The iron men of Troy made a further reduction of $10 per ton on the 1st of Oct.; this makes $30 a ton from the highest rate.

—— The yellow fever in Newberne is abating, and is of so mild a character now that it readily yields to medical treatment.

—— The military order forbidding the sale of fire-arms in Indiana, Ohio, Illinois and Michigan has been rescinded.

—— The prizefight between Harris and Martin, of New York, came off on the 5th Oct. in Pennsylvania. Harris was badly beaten after a fight of 45 minutes.

—— The Firemen's Benevolent Association of Chicago has just erected, at a cost of $10,000, a very handsome monument in commemoration of the Lake street calamity of 1857, when 30 persons lost their lives by a conflagration which destroyed an immense amount of property. The monument consists of a column 32 feet high, of Italian marble, and surmounted by a life-sized figure of a fireman in uniform. The marble was captured by a blockading vessel, having been intended for the State House in Columbus, S. C.

—— Gen. Hooker was honored with two or three serenades while at Columbus, Ohio, but being very busy, only made the following response: "Gentlemen, I have only time to say to you and to those who are gathered here to-night, that I am extremely busy in preparing to leave the city, to be absent a short time. I have not time to talk, if I wanted to, but I do not want to. I only desire to say I am extremely sensitive to the kindness shown me since I have been here. There is no one more sensitive to it than I am. I came here a stranger and found myself among friends. I shall return here as soon and as often as I can. I can say no more to-night, for I am very busy."

—— As a proof that the price of gold is regulated almost entirely by the success of our armies, it went up 6 per cent. on the 6th of Oct., merely because there was no news from the army.

—— At the regular meeting of the Chamber of Commerce a report was adopted transmitting a letter of eulogy to Capt. Winslow, of the Kearsarge, and recommending that $25,000 be appropriated for a testimonial to him and his fellow-officers.

—— Miss Nancy Rhodes, of Bremen, Maine, has had six sons in the army. Four have been killed in battle, one wounded and made a cripple for life, and the sixth now doing service in the field. One of the sons was wounded in the early stage of the war, and discharged, but got well and enlisted again.

Personal.—Father James Hennesy, pastor of St. Patrick's Chapel, Detroit, having been drafted on the last call, his numerous friends gathered around him, and offered to provide him with a substitute, but he refused, saying nobly, "No man shall run any risk for me. I am called upon by my country, and I mean to go." Several of his congregation urgently requested to go in his place, but he refused. Father Hennesy's example is a noble one.

—— Judge Kelley and Gen. Naglee are having a very angry and pointed correspondence in the newspapers, on the Chicahominy campaign.

—— Charles G. Halpine, known as Miles O'Reilly, and formerly of Gen. Hunter's staff, has just been admitted to the bar.

—— Mr. and Mrs. Tom Thumb sail for England on the 20th Oct., to make the grand tour of Europe.

—— Gottschalk is now in this city. He is about to make another visit to Mexico and Cuba.

—— Rev. Dr. Stone, of Boston, has accepted a call from San Francisco.

—— Gen. Philip H. Sheridan was born in Perry Co., Ohio, in 1834.

—— The Duke of Saxe-Coburg Gotha is shortly expected in Paris to superintend the rehearsal of an opera of which he is the composer, called "Casilda." The Duke is very anxious to see his works applauded at Paris.

—— Major-Gen. Dix, who, accompanied by Col. Ludlow, of his staff, has been on a visit to Detroit and other Western cities, on important business connected with the late piratical raids made on Lake Erie, has returned to this city. It is understood that the most thorough and searching investigation has been made in this matter, with a view to prompt action.

—— Mrs. Gen. Landor, formerly Miss Davenport, has resolved to return to the stage.

Military.—The following is the record of a youthful hero: John Fletcher, of Lafayette, Ind., private in Co. C, 65th Indiana Volunteer Infantry. He was born in Albany, N. Y., in 1851, and enlisted at Washington in the 4th U. S. cavalry in 1861, at the age of nine years, and sent to the field during Buell's and Bragg's campaign in Kentucky. He served in the 4th regular cavalry in that campaign, and was twice wounded, once in the leg at the engagement at Richmond, Ky., and again in the thigh at Perryville. He was discharged from the 4th cavalry on account of his wounds, and re-enlisted in the 65th Indiana Infantry Volunteers in February, 1864. Besides serving in the campaign in Kentucky, under Buell, he was at the battles of Chicamauga and Mission Ridge, and at Resacca and Kenesaw Mountain, and is now in Sherman's army at Atlanta. This 12 year old veteran is smart, active and brave—a good soldier, in short. "Long may he wave."

Naval.—The new ironclad Monadnock has returned to Boston from a very successful trial trip, her performance being considered satisfactory in every particular. She was propelled at the rate of ten knots an hour, with all her stores on board.

—— The new Japanese frigate, built here for the Tycoon, called the Fuseyama, made a trial trip on the 5th. She is the first of the war vessels to be built here for the Japanese Government, under the superintendence of Capt. Joseph J. Comstock. She carries 12 guns, and promises to be very fast; length, 207 feet; beam, 34; depth, 15 feet.

Obituary.—Ex-Gov. Reuben Wood, of Ohio, died at Rockport, in that State, on the 1st inst., aged 73 years. Gov. Wood went from this city to Cleveland, where he entered upon the practice of the law. In 1840 he was appointed Supreme Judge of the State of Ohio, and in 1849 was elected Governor by the Democratic party. In March, 1850, the new constitution went into operation, which vacated his office; but he was re-elected by a large majority in the fall of 1850. In 1853 he was appointed United States Consul to Valparaiso, where he served for eighteen months, when he resigned and came home. After his return from Valparaiso he took no active part in politics.

—— Private S. K. Dease, of Philadelphia, was shot through the head and instantly killed on the 5th inst., in Price township, Monroe county, Penn., he being one of a squad of men sent out to guard the person serving notices on drafted men. Two men were arrested on suspicion of being the criminals.

—— A singular case of assassination was recently perpetrated in Boston. As a man named Maurice was walking home from a ball, about three o'clock in the morning, he was shot by some unknown person, and died almost immediately. The murderer escaped.

—— The treaty between France and Cochin-China is completed. France maintains her foothold there and receives $20,000,000 indemnity.

—— A novel and interesting lawsuit is in progress at Vienna, Germany. A physician, who was deeply enamored of a young and lovely Viennese belle, expressed his desire to an elderly unmarried lady (who, without the doctor's knowledge, was in love with him), to marry, but, added the blushing physician, "I have not the means." The following day the lucky gentleman found himself in possession of a note inclosing a signed deed, assigning to him the amount of 150,000 roubles. The letter, which was from the elderly lady, said: "Your desire is now fulfilled; henceforth there is no obstacle in the way of matrimony." The overjoyed physician immediately repaired to the home of his adored, proposed and was accepted. But the elderly lady either misunderstood the doctor, or he misconstrued her gift; for she has sued the modest gentleman for the sum of 150,000 roubles, which he refuses to return. So far she has lost the suit in two courts, the jury, in both cases, being of opinion that, inasmuch as no marriage proposal was tendered, the doctor is entitled to the amount. In the meantime, the entente cordiale with the young lady (Miss Fishel) is in statu quo.

—— If "cards," on nuptial occasions, are going out of fashion in England, cartes are coming in. Not long since (says a London paper) we read of small photographs of the bride, and indeed bridegroom, too, being sent round to friends, instead of the old enamelled, silver-ligatured pasteboards; but we have, within a week, seen the sun-painting process turned to a still more extensive account in connection with these "auspicious occasions" in the form of large photographs of the bride, bridesmaids, bridegroom and best man all in one group.

—— Victor Hugo has published a letter recently, in which he gives an amusing account of his travels in England after a statue of Shakespeare. He is, Frenchmanlike, very severe upon there being a statue to Wellington, "the general who"—so says this truthful author—"gained one battle!" The prejudice of a Frenchman beats that of an Englishman out of the field.

—— The particulars of Capt. Speke's death are thus given in a private letter: "Capt. Speke was on a visit to his uncle, Mr. Fuller, of Neston Park, near Corsham, Wilts, the well-known London brewer, and was out shooting with Mr. George Fuller, his cousin. While getting over a low stone wall Capt. Speke, with an incautiousness remarkable in so practised a sportsman, held his gun with the muzzle towards him, and it going off the charge entered his body, passing completely through, severing the main arteries of the chest and lacerating the lungs. Mr. Fuller, hearing the gun fired, turned round in time to see his friend and relative fall from the wall into the field, and the keeper, who was marking birds at a short distance, seeing his master run towards the deceased, also went up and found him mortally wounded. He was only sensible for a few minutes. On Mr. Fuller coming up he moved his hand to his chest, and said feebly: 'Don't move me.' Shortly afterwards he breathed his last. A surgeon was on the spot very soon after the accident, but Capt. Speke was dead before his arrival. The deceased was 38 years of age and unmarried."

Chit-Chat.—The pumpkin is much cultivated in France for soup, and is held in great esteem. An annual prize is given by the Agricultural Society of Paris for the largest pumpkin, when a sort of coronation and procession takes place in its honor. She recently wrote over to a friend here: "I cannot but believe with you that this war is providential, and after its worst is done, its woes are past, will serve as a baptism for a new and higher life. A baptism of blood, true and terrible it is; but the grace of God will turn the very wounds, to eyes which see His will, to fountains of sympathy and charity. God bless America! My heart is there now more than ever, and were I more young I would be there soul and body, and mix among those who take care of the sick and wounded. But I am old, and shall hardly ever more cross the Atlantic except with my warm wishes."

—— George Augustus Sala, whose initials are gas, in a recent letter to a little penny paper called the London Telegraph, having said "that Boston was chiefly remarkable for its intense hatred of English gentlemen," an Irish clergyman, who has travelled extensively in the United States, after denying the statement, says: "I should know Boston as well, at least, as Mr. Sala, and I pronounce it a libel to assert that there is any peculiar hatred to the real English gentleman or the nation among the higher classes there. I ask Mr. Sala what city at home or in foreign lands treated the Prince of Wales with such royal honors? And in order to judge aright, may I inquire whether he was invited to the houses of the Winthrops, the Adamses and the Everetts of the proud city of the Puritans? Did he mingle with the dignified and splendid scholars of Harvard? Could he not see in the English look of everything, which he admits, that Boston, before all the world, delights in her English ancestry? Her scholars are English scholars, her Church is English, whether Puritan or Prelatic, her social life is English from basement to garret, the houses are like the memorials of the old ancestral halls out of which the English Salas of the 17th century drove her fathers; and if you step through the old cemetery in Tremont street, or go to Burial Hill at Plymouth, you will find that New England loves even to bury her dead in the good 'old country' style, and to trace the history of their English lineage upon their tombstones."

—— A correspondent communicates to the Times some particulars of the journey of exploration which two intrepid Dutch ladies are now making on the White Nile, and of the difficulties that beset their path. They had got to the Soudan, and had attempted to penetrate to the country of the Niam-Niamie. This, however, they were unable to do in consequence of the hostility and opposition of the native merchants, those ungallant persons having probibited the negroes to serve them or to supply them provisions. They complained to the Pasha of the Soudan, but were unable to obtain any redress or protection from him, and were thus compelled to abandon their expedition for the time.

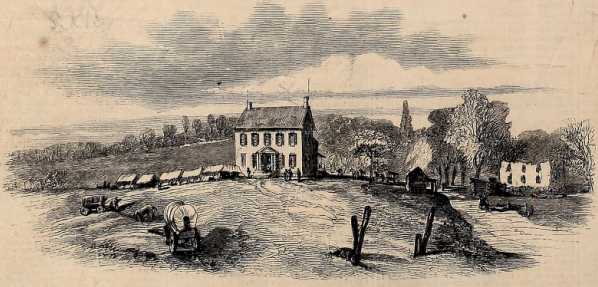
NEGRO HUMOR.

THE darkey has not the slightest idea of wit; he would let the most beautiful double entendre or the finest turned pun pass him without so much as an agitation of countenance, but when it comes to humor he is all at home. The simplest sayings of the negro are oftentimes the very epitome of fun. The comical idea he takes of himself as a chattel is illustrated by his characterizing some one of his color whom he does not like by a financial valuation, as, for instance, calling him "A $50 nigger!" or, as a better illustration, the remark of a venerable colored person I once met in Richmond, on the far upper part of Main street, over the drunken carcass of one of his own color. We had both stopped to look at the prostrate darkey, but without speaking a word, until the old fellow, looking me comically in the face, says, "I wondar whose property dis is layin' round yar so loose!" Another instance of a comical nature, though occurring under the gravest circumstances, comes to my mind. It was during the fever season of 1830, in New Orleans, that I heard of a singular case, which was attracting the attention of medical men. It was that of a negro woman who had died of the fever, and immediately after death had turned white, the skin having all the appearance of the Saxon. With many others, I had the curiosity to go and see her. The husband, who had been an officer's servant during the war of 1812–14, and had assisted in the defence of New Orleans, received the party, which consisted of half a dozen physicians and others, at the door, and with a "Wait a minute, genelmen!" disappeared through an open door. In a minute he called us to walk in, and we entered a room to see our military hero standing at the head of what proved to be the corpse of his wife, stretched on three chairs, and covered with a sheet. The hero of the cotton bags motioned and directed us to arrange ourselves at the foot of the defunct, and, then, catching the corners of the sheet in each of his hands, he shouted, "'Tention!" and with a half-face, throwing off the covering, he went on in a voice of command, "Uncubber—corpse!" and the dead woman was ready for examination. When our curiosity was satisfied, the ceremony was finished by our falling back to the foot, when the old darkey, who had stood immovable during its progress, flung on the sheet again to his own command of, "Cubber—corpse!" and we were again ushered into the street, after presenting a gratuity of 25 cents per head.



OSCANYAN'S SOIREES ORIENTALES.—Mr. Oscanyan, the well-known Oriental lecturer, is again creating a decided sensation by his Soirées Orientales, at Irving Hall, which wonderfully combine amusement, instruction and artistic effect. Our readers will remember that we published an illustration of one of the scenes in the harem, and hope, hereafter, to give another of some of the unique costumes of street life in the East, as they are produced by Mr. Oscanyan. The tableaux are highly effective and artistically interesting. The grouping of so many brilliant and often grotesque costumes creates a tout ensemble which interests all. The Oriental music, the perfume of the pastile, mingled with the fumes of the nargileh and chibouk, and the graceful movements of the dancing-girls, combine to realise much of the romance which we all associate with everything Oriental. The philosophy of Eastern institutions pervading the Christianity of the civilised world, as they are still maintained in the lands whence the sacred Scriptures emanated, is graphically explained by the lecturer. We can assure our readers throughout the country that they have a rich treat in prospect when Mr. Oscanyan commences his tour.

IRON MINE NEAR THE TOP OF PILOT KNOB MOUNTAIN, MISSOURI, RECENTLY CAPTURED BY THE REBELS.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. LOVIE

SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—HOSPITAL OF THE 8TH ARMY CORPS AT SPOUT SPRING MILL, ON THE OPEQUAN, VA.—SKETCHED BY OUR ARTIST, J. E. TAYLOR.

DEDICATION OF THE PASSIONIST MONASTERY,

At West Hoboken, New Jersey.

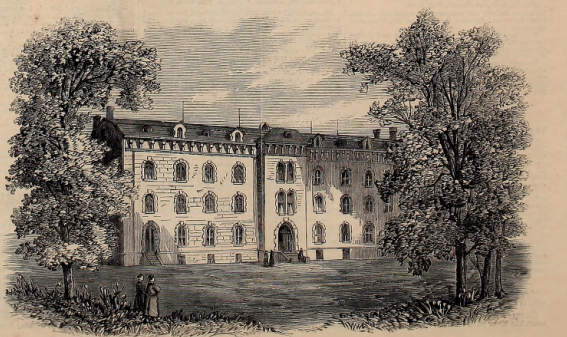
New York is beginning to be encircled by monasteries, convents and colleges directed by a few of the various religious orders which so abound in the Roman Catholic Church. A Convent of the Sacred Heart crowns the heights of Manhattanville, the Christian Brothers have a college on the same ridge of land, the Sisters of Charity occupy Forrest's former residence at Fort Hill, the Jesuits have a college at Fordham, and now, within a few months, a new and stately monastery has been erected on the other side of the Hudson, at West Hoboken, by the Passionists.

This order is comparatively a new one. It was founded in July, 1737, by the Blessed Paul of the Cross, who died in 1775, aged 81. It was confirmed by Benedict XIV. in 1741.

It is very severe in its fasts and austerity. The members are devoted to preaching and missions.

They were introduced into the United States in 1852, and established a monastery, or retiro, as they style it, at Pittsburg.

St. Michael's Monastery, at West Hoboken, was commenced in May last, and is a building 200 feet long by 200 feet wide, built of blue stone. There are five floors, with basement and attic. On the first floor will be the chapel, chapter-room, two parlors, tailor's and porter's room, and recreation hall. The upper storeys contain rooms for the members of the community. With the grounds attached, it cost about $46,000. It was dedicated on the 25th of September, in the presence of a large assemblage of people. The Superior is the V. Rev. Dominic Tarletini.



PILOT KNOB.

When travellers first told of mountains of pure iron in Missouri the story seemed fabulous; when at last the fact was established, speculation grew, cities were laid out near them and immense fortunes were to be made. Gradually things cohered down and the mines were properly worked. Among these iron hills is Pilot Knob, in Washington county, Missouri, about 60 miles south-west from St. Genevieve, on the Mississippi, and six miles from Iron Mountain. It is an isolated conical peak, covering an area of 360 acres, and rising very steeply to a height of 380 feet. Towards the top of the mountain the rock becomes ferruginous, with huge blocks of pure iron. About 440 feet from the base on the north a bed of ore 273 feet in length is exposed, and here is the mine of which we give a view in this paper. It was commenced in August, 1845. Iron Mountain is connected by railroad with St. Louis, and Pilot Knob, from its commanding position, has become in the present war a point of military importance.

It has recently been held by Gen. Ewing against a very heavy rebel force, who made a fierce attack under Gen. Cabell on Fort Davidson, but Ewing's few hundred repulsed them and the rebels drew off, leaving the ground around the fort literally covered with their dead and wounded. Their loss is estimated at 200 killed and 600 or 700 wounded. This victory enabled the gallant Ewing to draw off his little force to Mineral Point.

EIGHTH CORPS HOSPITAL AT SPOUT SPRING MILL.

Spout Spring, on the Opequan, was, before the last movement of Gen. Sheridan, the headquarters of the rebel Gen. Ramseur, who marched from it to Winchester, intending, doubtless, to return when Early had finished up the Yankee General. The mill on the right was burned by our troops on Sept. 17, for grinding grain for the enemy. It, with the brick house near it, belonged to Mr. Daniel T. Wood. The wounded in the battle were brought here, and it thus became the temporary hospital of the 8th corps.

THE APPROACHING ELECTION IN THE CAMPS—GROUP OF SOLDIERS READING POLITICAL HANDBILLS—SKETCHED IN THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, JOSEPH BECKER.

THE TWO SOLDIERS:

A Romaunt of the War.

BY C. D. O.

I.

Two maids walked by the shining sea,
One with a crown of raven hair,
And one with her tresses flowing free,
And the golden noon-rays resting there.

"Heart of mine," thus the dark maid cried,
"None save a soldier shall o'er command.
With a soul of flame and an eye of pride,
And his gleaming sword in his good right hand!"

"Mine I give," said the fair-haired maid,
"Even as thou, to a soldier's care;
In the cause of Truth is his soul arrayed,
With the sword of Faith and the shield of Prayer."

II.

Two youths walked by the forest green,
One with a haughty brow and eye,
And one with a calm and gentle mien
That cheered the soul of the passer-by.

"Raven locks and an eye of jet,
A proud-lip'd maid with a tropic cheek;
Such is the snare for my heart set!"
Thus did the haughty Southron speak.

"Tresses of gold," his comrade said,
"Eyes like the depths of a summer sea,
Cheeks where the bosom's truth is read,
Such is the guileless heart for me!"

III.

Two by the shining sea once more:
Tresses of gold and raven hair
And two in the shade of the forest hoar:
The haughty brow and the brow so fair.

Crisped hands in the locks of jet,
The proud lips clenched and the dark eye sear;
But the tresses of gold in a sable net,
And the blue eye bright with a chastening tear!

The fire quenched in the Southron eye,
The dark brow prone on the rebel sod;
But the fair face turned to the summer sky,
And the patriot soul at peace with God.

OVER THE WAY.

BY LILLIAN HOPE.

In was a pretty cottage, too pretty to remain long unoccupied. I was interested in the appearance of the gentleman who came to look at it. He was young, yet one could not help thinking that he had learned his strength—strength to grapple with life. I liked the young wife at first sight, too. She was fair, with soft folds of chestnut hair banded back from a smooth, open brow. There was a little one with them, a dear little girl of about two summers. It would have been a poet's duty to go mad at once over her golden curls, sunny blue eyes and dimpled cheeks. Such dainty, hasy little feet pattered over the uncarpeted floors!

They were pleased, and either purchased or rented, I do not know, and it does not matter which.

I am sure you never saw such a cheery, happy-looking house as that became. It seemed as if everything around it smiled. Every morning I heard the ring of a brisk step on the pavement, and, if I chose to look, saw a sweet pale-faced woman, with a blue-eyed little girl in her arms, both of them watching the loved one out of sight. At first, Birdie, as I heard them call her, would creep down the steps often during the day and run to the gate, calling "Papa, papa!" When the young mother came for her, she would put up her red lips grievingly, saying, "Papa no tome," or "Birdie want papa tome!" But after a while she seemed to learn to look for him about the sunsetting. Then she was sure to be at her post, peering through the gate, and calling "Papa!" as her dear baby voice till he appeared. The fair wife seemed just as eager and watchful as the child. Such a light would come into her eyes, and such quick blushes ripple over her cheeks, one would think her a timid maiden waiting for her lover. And no wonder; for such exceeding tenderness as that man manifested for his wife and child was beautiful to behold. It is as rare as beautiful. I was witness to many glad reunions. Time after time I watched them, till—I am ashamed to confess it—till the pain at my heart grew heavier, seeing the full measure of their content.

I did not envy them—at least, I was not conscious of harboring so sinful a feeling—but the contrast between their smiling faces and my darkened chambers was too great.

Not that I was utterly unloved or uncared for, but the dear father and mother, most loving and best loved of all, had hidden me good-bye and gone home to that other country. They died of the same disease; one in the hush and darkness

THE OFFER OF MARRIAGE REFUSED.

cherry lips as she had—such lovable, kissable lips! I longed to cross over the way and, taking the blessed child in my arms, bring her back with me to my lonely home. Perhaps the sunshine and gladness would follow her. Such a sweet baby voice! It sounded through those empty rooms as she prattled away to "papa" and "mama," while of a moonless midnight, the other as the flush of sunrise tinged the orient. This was in the month of roses.

I had no sister; of my two brothers, one was a sailor, captain of his own vessel—I remembered his departure, but it was a dim remembrance, like a half forgotten dream—the other, nearer my own age, was a student at Heidelberg.

You perceive that I was "monarch of all I surveyed," and, with the exception of Mrs. Stone, an elderly widow lady, distantly related to my father, who had been our housekeeper for many years, alone in my dominions. Mrs. Stone pitied my orphanage. She was sympathising and endeavored to be companionable, but she was still, and odd, and old-fashioned in her ways. She was in all respects a most estimable woman; but the stillness, so unnatural in our house, with her widow's weeds and my own black garments, continually reminded me of death and the grave.

Summer passed, and each day seemed to bring some new joy to that happy family over the way. In the the morning the young wife sang among her flowers to her little one, and in the evening that rich bass voice was an accompaniment not to be despised. Their piano was a fine, full-toned instrument, and the pitying winds wafted the strains over to me, but they brought no soothing. Ours had been a happy household, a household given to kind words and pleasant laughter and much song.

In the autumn Mrs. Stone requested permission to invite Winnie Halsted, a niece of hers, to spend the winter with us. I consented. But Winnie was not a lively girl; she seemed to fall readily into her aunt's quiet ways. In thinking of her now, however, I do not believe it was her natural manner; perhaps our long faces and sombre garments frightened her, if so, it must have been a dreary winter to the poor girl; for, altogether, we were a most melancholy group.

At length I fell sick of a low, nervous fever, caused, doubtless, by great depression of spirits. Mrs. Stone grew anxious. She was a good and gentle nurse. Sometimes she would look at me earnestly, then shake her head and say, in an aside to Winnie, that something must be done to rouse me from despondency or I would die.

"She takes it so hard. But then it was terrible. Their dying so suddenly, and both together as it were; and she so young, and alone, too, poor thing!"

I used to listen to her low words when she thought me asleep, and wonder if I would die. Not that I dreaded it. Indeed, no. Anything to be with them.

But the long winter dragged away, and, very slowly, I grew better—grew able to wander over the house again, shrinking from a shadow and trembling at the echo of my own footsteps in the silent rooms. I was pale and thin and spiritless. It seemed as if nothing but death would release me from the state of listless apathy into which I had fallen.

"Why did you not come at once to me, Anna Lee? Mrs. Stone should have written long ago; you, poor darling, have been too sick and sorrowful to care even for me. To think that the young year walked over their graves, and I all unawares! Your heart is crushed; I know it, little one. You believe it buried beyond hope of resurrection. You are sure that to you this fair earth of ours has lost its beauty and its bloom for ever. Perhaps this is not so, Anna; perhaps there is a long life of brightness yet before you, if you will. Is this mockery? Come to me, dear child. Have I not a right to weep with you? Are we not sisters by adoption? Were not your honored parents mine in my great sorrow? Who else will pillow your head upon her bosom, feeling that your loss is also hers? Come, my sister; you are sick, I will heal you; you are pale, the sea breezes will plant roses in your cheeks. I have taught my little ones to love you; they eagerly await your coming. I so regret that we have not had you with us all those weary months. I am sick to think of your pining in that great, silent house! Come back with Leonard, dear one, he will follow close upon the footsteps of my letter. Come, weary child, and fold your tired wings in a home that can never be closed to you. Come, Anna, and Leonard will point you to the shining way that leads to that blessed city where your beloved are."

This was the letter that came to me in the early spring. It was from Ruth Willis, my cousin. Then I wondered that in all those months my thoughts had not once turned to her. She was older than I, but I remembered that, in the long ago, when death was very cruel to her, my parents found room in their hearts for another. She came to our home and was one of us till she married Leonard Willis, a clergyman, and went with him to his parish, by the "sounding sea." She was a dear girl; I believe my parents loved her as if she had been their own. But a number of years had passed since she married, she was older than I, as I said; most of the time I had spent at school, and it seemed, somehow, as if she had slipped out of my life entirely. That letter brought her vividly to mind, and with the recollection came a yearning to pillow my head upon her bosom, as she had written, and to feel the loving pressure of her soft arms around me, after the manner of the olden time.

I thought myself utterly unable to endure the fatigue of travel, but you cannot imagine the strength that letter gave me. Verily, it brought healing on its wings! When, a day or two after, I heard cousin Leonard's voice in the hall, I actually ran down to meet him. He took me in his arms as a brother might have done, and kissed me over and over; and I, foolish girl that I was, laid my head down upon his breast and cried like a child.

Winnie and Mrs. Stone had packed my trunks, and the next morning I bade them quite a cheerful good-bye.

I must tell you of my last look at that cottage over the way. I said—did I not?—that the sight of such uninterrupted happiness was bitterness instead of balm. It was wrong; but I was very weak, and could not put the feeling from me. In my own chamber the curtains of the windows that looked upon the street had not been lifted for many a day.

We had learned nothing of that pleasant family, only that the name was Peyton, and that Mrs. Peyton was in very delicate health. This was the cause of their advent upon our quiet street, so far from the business part of the town.

We were to take an early train, and I was ready for departure, when I stole back to my room, and going to one of those windows of which I have spoken, put back the heavy crimson hangings and looked out. It was a pleasant picture that I saw, and memory framed it.

Mr. Peyton was running down the walk, that darling baby following as fast as her little feet could go. Smiling, Mrs. Peyton brought up the rear. Mr. Peyton put the gate between the little one and himself, and stood looking over at her, talking to her, but the cunning little elf thrust her chubby fingers through the wires and caught his hand, laughing with great glee. He feigned distress and anxiety to get away, while the young mother pretended to assist the child.

After a while he started down the street, looking back every other step to smile and say "Bye!" to Birdie, who called to him till he was out of sight. With a silent adieu to these strangers that I knew so well, a silent prayer that their happiness might know no change, I dropped the curtains and went down.

Soon we were hurrying towards that home upon the sea.

Beltonville, so called after the "oldest inhabitant," was quite a stirring, thriving little village; yet there was but one church, and of this cousin Leonard Willis was pastor.

A year slipped by. In the genial atmosphere of that seaside home something of my old spirit came back to me. Mrs. Stone still kept my house. I had no purpose or desire to return.

My income was limited. I looked around me for something to do. Belton seminary was about fifteen minutes' walk from the parsonage. It was respectable and flourishing. I applied for a situation as teacher. There was a vacancy in the primary department, it was the only one. They would be happy to engage my services, if we could "agree as to terms." We met with no difficulty. They were courteous, and I was not unreasonable. My home was still to be with cousin Ruth.

I never thought myself particularly attractive, yet children always cling to me. I believe this is a rule that has had no exception. I suppose it is because I love them so. To my surprise, I found myself becoming popular with parents as well as children. During the second term, Miss Honey, preceptress, resigned on account of ill health. The situation was offered me.

I was inexperienced; there were many young ladies among the students who were older than I. It was a position of too much responsibility. I hesitated. But the trustees united in urging it upon my acceptance; the faculty seemed anxious. My education had been thorough; in the end I silenced my scruples and entered upon new duties and new trials;—not, however, without occasional misgivings. It would seem that never a teacher had less cause for misgiving than I. My classes were affectionate and respectful, my associate teachers considerate and kind. The good people of the place seemed to vie with each other in attention to the "stranger within their gates."

Thus passed two more years. I did not weary of my employment; I can truly say that those were years of pleasantness and peace. It is well that we have not power to unveil the future. To know that evil is in store would ill-fit us for the enjoyment of the present.

About the middle of the second year a letter came to cousin Leonard from a brother of his, somewhere in the far West.

He was going to cross the ocean. It was a matter of business that clamored for immediate attention. He knew sister Ruth's great capacity for loving! Would she take his motherless little girl to her fold for awhile? She could not go with him, and how could he leave her to the care of strangers? He was just going to send her to that good aunt of hers, without preliminary questioning, or shadow of doubt of the gentlest of welcomes. One thing he would like to ask.

Would sister Ruth talk often to the child of a dear one dead? He had done so; he wished to keep the memory of her mother green in the heart of his little girl. He wished it to be a pleasant memory, and truthful, of one who was gentle, beautiful and good. And so in the twilight, before the lamps were lit, when he sat with his little one close folded to his heart, he talked to her of a grave upon Lake Michigan, and a fair young mother who passed through its portals to a "happy land" where the angels dwell. Would sister Ruth sometimes do the same?

It would be such happiness to see them in their home, but this could not be till he returned from over the waters. A friend—one whom Stella loved—was coming to the Atlantic States, she would be safe with him. He knew brother Leonard; he knew sister Ruth; he did not fear to entrust his own lamb to their keeping. He knew that just as tenderly as they cared for their own little flock, just so tenderly would they care for her. The dear God grant his darling to be an "angel in their household."

Cousin Leonard read the letter aloud, Ruth leaning on his shoulder, looking over as he read.

"Poor boy," said Leonard, musingly; "three summers have scattered their blossoms over the grave of his young wife, and still he mourns as one who cannot be comforted!" and saying this, he reached up and drew Ruth's arm around his neck, as if thanking God in his heart, that, while one had been taken, the other was left.

"How old is this little Stella of whom he writes?" asked I.

"Let me see," said Ruth, pausing a little, as if in doubt, "she was four when Ellen died, I think; she must be about our Willie's age," glancing across the room to a bright-looking, curly-headed seven year old, who sat in the window, lost to everything but his first experience of Robinson Crusoe.

You may be sure that the doors of cousin Ruth's good heart flew wide open to take in the little stranger. Motherless! This was the "open sesame!" Sister Ruth! as I called her, thinking of the letter, of the little girl who was coming; thinking, too of the sisterly solicitude she was—in a thousand little, loving ways—continually manifesting for me.

"Stella" proved to be an unusually interesting and attractive child.

A little shy at first, a little afraid of her new found friends. But this could not last, and when you knew her, and she loved you, you found such a clinging affectionateness of disposition, that you trembled for her womanhood. A very beautiful child was this little Stella. Her long, shining curls—of that peculiar golden hue so much admired, yet so seldom seen—parted over a forehead that was marble in its whiteness.

There was the faintest bloom upon her cheeks, and her red lips curved so prettily, there was such a dewy sweetness in her blue eyes, that I never looked at her without longing to take her to my heart, and keep her there for ever. I grew to love her very much. In the morning, when I went to my classes, she was the last to kiss me good-bye, and the first to welcome me at night. I was pleased with this, for, although rich cousin Ruth's bright, good little boys were very dear to me, there was a deeper tenderness in my heart for this motherless little girl than I had ever felt for them.

It was vacation. The first vacation that had occurred since my connection with the school, to which I had looked forward with irrepressible impatience. I have said that cousin Leonard lived by the "sounding sea." I love the ocean. For hours I have wandered on the smooth beach, or sat upon the battlements—as I called a rocky section of the coast about two miles from the village—watching the blue waves dotted with white sails, the seagull skimming over the waters, or the bald-eagle darting down upon its prey.

The day was mine for as lengthy a ramble as I desired. Ned and Willie—Ruth's boys—were with their father in his study; Stella—as I thought—in the nursery. I was glad of this, for, although they were the invariable companions of all my walks, I greatly preferred, that morning, to leave them behind. I slipped out quietly, congratulating myself upon being unnoticed. But I "reckoned without my host." I had not proceeded far when I heard the swift patter of little feet behind me, and Stella's voice calling:

"Wait, auntie"—a fashion of Ruth's boys that she had copied—"wait, I'm coming!"

The child never doubted my willingness; she was never happier than when with me; a refusal to let her accompany me would be an act without a precedent; I could not send her back!

It was in the month of March, yet we had one of those clear, balm-breathing days that seldom come to us earlier than the flowers of May. The air was full of freshness and vitality.

Stella was wild with excitement. She danced along the path, singing fragments of songs, and filling her apron with shells; occasionally running back to show something quaint or curious that old ocean had tossed upon the shore. I knew of a sort of semicircle among the rocks that opened to the sea. Far back in the shadow was a rude kind of platform, and detached pieces of boulders made excellent seats. It was sufficiently elevated to be, at all times, above the reach of the tides.

This was a favorite retreat of mine. I think no one else ever visited it. At least I never was disturbed in my solitude.

As we sat down I saw a vessel steaming into harbor. I wondered if it might not bring tidings for my little Stella from a "foreign shore." The child was very weary. I looked at her flushed cheeks and drooping eyelids, and began to think I had not cared for her as I ought. I untied her hat, and drew her pretty, golden head down into my lap. In a little while she was fast asleep.

I told you that my years were passing pleasantly. I have acknowledged the exceeding kindness of teachers and friends. All this was, new, an experience of the past! I had been so happy! So sure and proud of my position! My position in the hearts of those around me, I mean; and very grateful I had felt for it, too. Had the change been gradual, perhaps, I could have borne it better; but it was a precipitate transition from tropical warmth to Artic coldness, and it chilled me so!

Yes, I had been very happy at cousin Ruth's, but weariness of spirit had come to me, even there.

Professor Steele—principal of our seminary—was a man of sufficient ability to perform the duties incumbent upon him, with credit to himself and to the school. He was affable in his demeanor to all, but particularly so to ladies. He never forgot to be polite and courteous to them. Moreover, he was a religious man. He made long prayers in public places, gave much alms, and was considered a burning and shining light in the one church of Beltonville, of which he was an honored member. Nevertheless, I could not like him.

From the first—although I received a most elaborate welcome—I felt repelled. His affability was oily, and I could not rid myself of an uncomfortable feeling that his sanctimoniousness was hypocrisy.

No doubt it was all very absurd; I had sufficient sense to keep my opinions to myself.

Let no one suppose that I am covertly sneering at Christianity. It is as far from my heart to do so as the east from the west. Heaven forbid that a woman's pen should ever be thus guilty. As for me—Leonard Willis, cousin Ruth, your blameless and well ordered lives are before me—surely it could never be mine! I feel a respect, that is nearly allied to reverence, for those, who—professing the name of Christians—show by their walk and conversation that they have been with God.

To return to Professor Steele. It seems that the dislike was not reciprocal. In the beginning of the term that had just closed he made me an offer of marriage. Of course I was obliged to refuse. I endeavored to do it kindly, with as little injury to his self-love as possible. But he pressed his suit till I became indignant, and plainly told him that his persistence was not honorable or gentlemanly, and the subject must not be renewed.

I did not take blame to myself for this, for, as I said, from the first, I felt repelled, and had never been as friendly and cordial as is my wont with those with whom I am thrown into such intimate association. It was soon apparent that I had made a bitter enemy. There was no change in his manner towards me that others could see, unless he became a little more gentle and partonising than before, yet that man showed me that I was in his power; he could harass and annoy me continually; and he did it, too, in a thousand mean, contemptible ways, without mercy or limitation. I began to stumble on groups of girls, young ladies, generally, that I had censured for improprieties of conduct—whose earnest, almost audible whispering would cease, only to be renewed with little bursts of derisive laughter, and muttered ejaculations of contempt as I passed on. Insolent people stared at me upon the street. Those who had been most friendly hurried by with hardly a nod of recognition. One who remained true explained the matter.

That man was at the bottom of it all.

Very cunningly he began the diabolical work of undermining my reputation. Sometimes when favorable mention was made of me, he would roll his solemn eyes up to the flies upon the ceiling—Well—yes—he trusted she was an amiable person; he hoped her influence over the young ladies was salutary! Again—It would be a matter of regret if the trustees were deceived. But we must be charitable; we we all frail, erring creatures! If any one requested an explanation—Oh! There was nothing to explain! He wished no one to attach any weight to his opinion in such a case. People must judge for themselves; if they saw nothing, his lips should be sealed!

At other times, perhaps, he would only shrug his shoulders and shake his head, saying nothing, but looking unutterable things.

How much might be implied! How much is expressed often by these eloquent shrugs of the shoulders, shakes of the head and upliftings of the eyebrows? Then, if you question, their astonishment is supreme, and they innocently ask what they have ever said!

The leaven worked. Professor Steele was a gentleman of acute judgment and undoubted piety; he could not be in fault. They wondered that they had ever given such ready countenance to a stranger!

They had been duped; it would learn them wisdom. They failed to perceive that my evident possession of their pastor's confidence and esteem was a stronger claim to their consideration than any that Professor Steele had furnished. They were anxious to discover the exact nature of my offence; they thought it quite right and proper that they should know; but that wonderful man adroitly parried all their attacks upon the citadel of his secret knowledge. Serene as a May morning, yet utterly impenetrable. It was aggravating, but after all, his discretion was praiseworthy. Had I told the exact and simple truth it would have been hooted at as falsehood. That noble man vindictive and malevolent!

I saw that if I did not voluntarily go I should be requested to do so. You may be sure I had no disposition to remain. Accordingly, at the close of the term I sent in my resignation. It was accepted without the farce of regrets. All of which was, as yet, entirely unknown to my friends at the parsonage. Perhaps I have been somewhat prolix, and yet I do not know that one can dwell too long upon the character of a good man. Such an anomaly, you are aware. Bear with me for feeling and writing bitterly. That man caused me much suffering.

I was very wretched that March morning when I sought my hiding-place among the rocks, to decide upon some plan of action for my future; this done, I would tell Leonard and Ruth all that it was necessary for them to know, and then bid them good-bye for ever. Yes, for ever, for I could never come back to them with a stain upon my good name. I was innocent, but this would not avail. It was cruel that I should so suffer. I am afraid that I felt very wickedly. I remember thinking that a kind Providence would not permit it.

During all these years I had not looked once upon the graves of my parents. I would go back to that city where, after all, was the only place I had a right to call my home.

I had forgotten the vessel in the harbor, forgotten that a dear little girl was sleeping quietly, with her head in my lap; I did not know that the day was waning. The sea moaned; premonitory symptom of the approaching storm; I did not heed; I sat with my head upon my knees, oblivious to everything but wretchedness.

"As I live, they are both asleep!"

It was cousin Leonard's cheery, ringing voice that roused me; he was coming rapidly up the rocky path. There was another gentleman with him. I started hastily, and would have sprung to my feet, but the heavy weight in my lap prevented.

"It is my brother, cousin Anna Lee," said Leonard, "he has landed within the hour; we would not have intruded upon you, but brother could not wait for you to come with Stella."

I looked up to acknowledge the pleasant bow and smile. To my surprise I knew that countenance well. Cousin Leonard called the man brother, and told of his having lived West. Notwithstanding this, notwithstanding the dissimilarity in names, I was perfectly certain that the man before me was the one who did live in cottage "over the way!" I remembered how their happiness mocked my misery then, and wondered if it was his fate to cross my path at times when hope—if not dead—lay sleeping in my heart.

The sound of voices wakened Stella. She rubbed her sleepy eyes and looked around, to spring with a glad cry of recognition to her father's open arms.

Leonard came over to me, assisting me to rise, drawing my arm within his own.

What can possibly be the matter, cousin Anna?" he asked, in a low, anxious voice. "You are white as the dead, and you glared upon us so," laughing as he said it, "that I declare I am afraid brother thought we had found a fit subject for treatment in an insane asylum instead of my cousin Anna, of whom he has so often heard. You stayed too long upon those damp rocks; your hands—for I suppose they were his useless in his warm clasp; he shocked suddenly round, facing me—" Anna Lee, will you tell me what ails you?"

Mr. Pierre—you see I felt sure of his identity—had gone forward with Stella. I looked up at cousin Leonard, but somehow I had no voice for words. Had I spoken, I do not know what I could have said. He just put his good, strong arm around me, partly leading me, partly carrying me, till we reached the house.

"Here, wife," said he, "put this child to bed, will you? She is sick, or obstinate, probably the latter. In either case, Spellman shall have an opportunity to test his skill."

I did not smile, as usual, at his pleasantry; I think I wished, indeed, to appear sick. I do not know—I did not leave it again for many a day.

In the delirium of sickness we sometimes reveal secrets that we had thought to keep hidden for ever. I suppose they discovered many things that I would never, willingly, have made known. It was best that it should be so. Had I gone to them for counsel in the hour of my troubles, how I should have had fewer days of wretchedness and fewer sleepless nights to weep away.

Cousin Leonard was perfectly grieved, surprised and indignant. He found it difficult to credit the fact that his people could so presume one whom their pastor loved. An honored inmate of his own house. I have said little of this good man, but if you whose eyes are resting on this page have grown sour, and cynical, and misanthropical, if—seeing so much of sin, and crime, and crime upon the earth—you have come to lose all faith in man, I invite you to visit that unpretending parish and make the acquaintance of its pastor. His is a religion that maketh glad the heart, and he believes if the heart is full of gladness it will beam from the eye and tremble upon the lip. The children of his people love him, and the humblest of his parish know that in him they have a friend.

During the long weeks of that terrible brain fever—as they called my sickness—he was not idle. He marveled that the fullest justice should be done me. To this end he proceeded—first, to make private investigations into the antecedents of my position and station. Professor Steele was graduated from Yale. He came thence with many recommendations of ability, acquirements and piety! Cousin Leonard had friends in that time-honored institution. He wrote to one of to whose discretion and co-operation he could trust. His friend's knowledge was limited. He had understood that Professor Steele was originally from Bennington, Vermont. He believed his parents were still living there.

Further than this he knew nothing. If desired, he would make quiet inquiry, and report results.

I imagine that exclamations were sharp par when the facts that his quiet inquiry brought to light were publicly made known.

Will you believe it? That man, whom the church thought to be without spot or blemish, and the community delighted to honor; who had filled me with his hate for the single reason that I could not love him and would not become his wife, was already a married man!

A Benedict of several years standing! Far up among the mountains of Vermont they found her—the deserted wife!

She had been a belle, and many a rustic youth was refused the love of him, for she was studious and sought their mountain breezes for the restoration of his health. She lived with her parents in an obscure little—of-the-world hotel, feeding her poor fond heart with the hope that he would yet come back to her.

In the meantime the professor pursued the "even tenor of his way" as sleek, and pompous, and complacent as ever. Upon my last decided rejection of me he immediately began paying his addresses in another quarter. Rumor and that certain mysterious preparations were going rapidly forward in the house of Deacon Garfield.

Lizzie Garfield was the acknowledged belle and sweetest maiden in all Beltonville. Her parents were pleased and proud that their daughter should do so well, and yet they did not think it strange for who could help admiring Lizzie? They had been a little fearful that she cared for Tom Rushford—the business young bachelor—who was so smitten with her charms. He was of a good family; doing well in his profession—called a rising young man. They liked Rushford, only—unfortunately—he was not religious. It did not seem exactly the thing for a deacon's daughter to marry out of the pale of the church.

Lizzie marvelled that that grave man should seek her favor; she stood much in awe of him, but that she supposed was because he was so much older, and better, and wiser than she. She was never at ease with him as she was with Tom. One could not feel afraid of Tom; he was always so cheerful, and chatty, and pleasant. Her secret fears gave him the preference, but her parents approved of Professor Steele, and she ought to be thankful for her good fortune. Since it was a special interposition of Providence in her behalf. She sewed busily away upon her bridal garments, trying to believe that she was contented and happy, but she could not help a stray tear now and then, and she did not sing about her work as usual.

Cousin Leonard communicated the important intelligence he had received to a few of the members of his church—Deacon Garfield among the number—and to the astounded trustees of that flourishing seminary farther than this it was not known, for as yet no letter had been received by mail. Agencies were working to bring hidden things to light of which they were ignorant.

Professor Steele attended a religious gathering one evening—it was nearly midnight when he returned to his rooms. He took a letter from the office on his way, and ascended to his study, to pause to look at the contents then. This was the note that was afterwards found upon his dead body:

"I say, Jim, resign yourself to the loss of the deacon's moneybags; it is time for you to pack up your traps and start. Your contortions with the prim schoolma'am there was vexatious to be sure, but your way of courting wasn't exactly the thing. You've walked up the parson.

"Somehow he's got wind of your finer pas with that fresh little bit of fruit—your cousin Anna. Demedly pretty, wasn't she though! Pity you actually married her, you must have been waking, old boy. But, as I said, the parson's got wind of it, and he'll come down upon you like an avalanche. You see the schooling is complete—he and his wife, and he is interested. I tell you, Jim Steele, your pretty face will be of no avail. He'll make a clean sweep. I don't think he's heard of your nice little establishment in Vermont, but he'll find it out, you may depend. I advise you to be nowhere at home when you can conveniently make it convenient. I've a plan in my head, and I hope and trust it will work. I'll pass you off upon my governor for a Methodist minister. Promising, eh? Now, and all kind sort of thing! He'll take; he'll beg you to his heart, and he'll present you to the church till you decide where next to ventilate your genius.

"I'm a pretty sister at home now; you can make love to her in his house, and that's a pretty little thing though, and I don't like fellows of your stamp to be too much in the way of my trophies. Don't fail to come, for your game is up in that old rooster's mansion.

A train passed through the place at midnight, stopping five minutes at the station. Crowding a few things into his valise, the crestfallen professor was hastening from the house when the walk, out upon the dark, silent street. There was a footstep heavily, and freezing upon the pavements as it fell. He was a little behind time; the train had started, but a passenger was standing upon the steps of a passenger car. He turned to enter, his foot slipped upon the icy platform, he fell between the cars and was instantly killed.

It was a cruel death. When word was brought to cousin Leonard, they said that this was his righteous judgment; that "the transgressor is hard." Deacon Garfield shuddered, and thanked the God of his fathers that Lizzie was safe from him.

After many days my fever turned. Reason came back to me. I lay helpless and weak as a child, but dangerous symptoms had passed. This was the verdict of the physician: "I shall tell you, Leonard, I heard Ruth say, one day; "it will prove a better physician than Dr. Spellman's medicines. One has strong enough to hear good tidings, aren't you, darling?"

Very gently she imparted the glad news that the dark side of trouble appears only to human gaze, and now I was held in higher esteem than ever before. They did not tell me then that Professor Steele was dead, only that he would return not to turn; they feared the shock would be too great. They assured me, however, that the humiliated and penitent villagers were convinced that I—harmless child that I was—had not been guilty of any very grievous wrong; I had been sinned against rather than sinning.

Those were happy days, the days of my convalescence. They were all so kind to me, my friends at the parsonage I mean. It is true that the people around us were assiduous in attentions; they were mortified and angry with themselves; they were anxious to atone for their temporary estrangement, and literally overwhelmed me with kindness. I endeavored to appear and even to feel grateful, but they had doubted me—I could not forget that. Only a few days, cousin Leonard's boys, and Stella, my blue-eyed darling, were overjoyed to know that anna would get well.

Leonard's brother was still absent, too, was kind; he brought me new books, fresh flowers and early fruits, and when I was strong enough gave me long rides upon the heath. I was not find it at all difficult to feel very grateful for his numberless acts of kindness. I surmised that he had learned the history of me for past months, and his generous heart was stirred to pity. I believe there was a little mystery about him that I have not explained, for my kind cousin Leonard's brother only. I was not mistaken in supposing that to be the gentleman who once tenanted that cottage over the way during my own old home, although I found that cousin Leonard was not inclined to be close proximity at the time of his coming for me, and he had omitted to inform him of the change in his bearing.

It seems that sweet Ellen Peyton was constitutionally delicate. The knowledge of her hereditary consumptive tendencies kept her parents in a state of continual alarm. Soon after I left the city he took her to her father's home in Western Michigan, hoping the change of climate, coupled with the warm, fostering tenderness she would find to find under the old roof-tree, would prove beneficial. But all in vain. Ellen, the child, bidding her husband the calm good-night of the Christian, in the hope of a resurrection unto life immortal.

He lingered—for the Angel of Death still stood upon the threshold. He saw the mother of his young wife laid to rest by the side of her darling, and then—keeping his little one with him—he wandered away, hardly knowing or caring whither, till he found himself in San Francisco—our Al Dorado of the West. Here he entered into business. He was from San Francisco that he sent the little Stella to the care of her friends upon the Atlantic shore. The dear child had travelled quite extensively for so diminutive a maiden.

In the meantime a note came to me from the trustees of the seminary. They were profuse in apologies, petitions for pardon, and humble hopes that I would be willing to overlook the past, and honor them by returning to a position that they were sure no other could so creditably fill. They had procured an old acquaintance for that unprincipled Professor Steele, but my place was still vacant—they had purposely left it so. They wished me to come to it at my earliest. Do you suppose anything could have induced me to enter that Inquisition again?

Good cousin Leonard spared me the pain of replying. He took it upon himself to notify them that, while I thanked them for this evidence of renewed confidence, I was sunshine of their favor had once been withdrawn from me without a cause, I feared that it might happen again; in short, I had no wish to risk the painful liability, and he assured them my friends entirely approved my decision. Thus ended my connection with the Seminary for ever.

During the days of my convalescence Lizzie Garfield called around to see me. She whispered a parting that her parents had withdrawn their opposition to her union with—and so she expected to become Mrs. Tom Rushford.

I set by an open window that looks out upon the sea, listening to the ripple of the waves that ripple and break upon the shore. They call me an invalid still, but mine is no languid pulse. Health and strength are rapidly returning. Four years ago this day I looked upon the dead faces of my parents. Sorrow and joy have been meted out to me since then. To-night I see no cloud in all my sky.

Arthur Peyton has asked me to be his wife. I think he can see, like the one who sleeps; I do not think he can love me quite so fondly as he loved that gentle, beautiful woman. Sometimes this thought brings a little sadness to the heart that I know I love him, and I strive to put it from me as a weak and selfish feeling. I believe that I am necessary to his happiness, as he is to mine. I know that he loves me tender and true. Have I not seen his tenderness?

He has asked me to be another to his little girl. The little one that I have already called my blue-eyed Stella, my sweet-voiced darling! The dear child that loves me so, that I so love, that I so loved when I first looked upon the echo of her baby voice. It seems wonderful that I did not know her, but years have changed her much.

I am going to try to fill the void to them, to be a faithful wife and mother to them.

Wherever we go, may love brighten and bless our home, as it did that home, the memory of which haunted me for some of the years agone in that cottage "Over the Way!"

NEARER TO LIFE'S WINTER.

NEARER to life's winter, wife,
We are drawing nearer,
Memories of the spring
Growing dearer, dearer.

Through the summer's heat we've toiled,
Through the autumn weather
We have almost passed, sweet wife,
Hand in hand together.

Time we hearts were, well as feet,
Lighter, I perceive;
April's looks of gold are turned Silver this November.

Flowers are fewer than at first,
And the way grows dearer,
For under life's infirmity,
We are drawing nearer.

Nearer to life's end, sweet wife,
We are drawing nearer;
The last milestone on the way
Our eye sight grows clearer.

Some whose hands we held grow faint,
And let go our hold,
Looking backward, we to-day
All their graves may number.

Heights we've sought we've failed to climb,
Fruits we've failed to gather;
But what matter, since we've still
Jesus and each other.

AN UNEXPLAINED MYSTERY.

MANY of the old citizens of New Orleans will remember the case of M. Pierre Dussaint and daughter, though over forty years have elapsed since it was the exciting matter of the day.

M. Pierre Dussaint was one of the old and wealthy families, and the name is still scattered through Louisiana. He had achieved great wealth as a merchant in New Orleans, and having retired from business, lived in refined elegance in a mansion at the upper end of Chartres street with only his daughter, a beautiful girl of seventeen, and his solitary child. M. Pierre Dussaint, with all the pride of family, joined to that of his great wealth, looked for a high and brilliant alliance for Mademoiselle Natalie, and sometimes gave such vague hints that nothing less than a visit to France, and the introduction of the blood of the old aristocrats, would satisfy his cravings. There was little wonder, therefore, that when a New Yorker, travelling on business for his employers in that city, met Natalie and inspired in the girl's breast a passion, that M. Pierre indignantly rejected the suitor, and denied him all access to Natalie, though without interfering his daughter harshly.

Waterton, the lover, left New Orleans, and for a year nothing was heard of him by the father, though the servants well knew that a correspondence was kept up between him and Natalie, and that many presents found their way to the young lady from New York. At the time of Waterton's residence in New Orleans he had always openly professed his belief in the supernatural, and, though an educated man, avowed his reliance in charms and professions against evil spirits, especially showing a desire to become acquainted with the Obi and other charms and philtres of the negroes.

At the end of about a year M. Pierre was taken sick, a slight indisposition at first, but growing more severe week by week, until he could not leave his bed. During this time nothing could be more attentive and self-sacrificing than Natalie. Night and day she was with him, and no food or medicine was administered but by her hand. Long afterwards, when this was discussed, and the servants collated their knowledge, which they had not dared do during the progress of the event, they told of the almost unconcealed action of Natalie in pouring something which she poured from a black vial, always carried in her bosom, in every dish of food offered to her father, and of the fact that upon one day, when an untasted bowl of soup was sent away from his bedside, and eaten by a mulatto body servant of M. Pierre's, it made the man very sick, from which he took several days to recover.

All this went on from day to day, and the servants, of whom there were over twenty in the house, discussed the matter among themselves, and made no hesitation in declaring in their own circle that M. Pierre was being poisoned by Natalie in pursuance of her love for Waterton, the attending physician was a young Alabamian, who had long been an admirer of Natalie's, but who was rejected by the well-known pride of the father. Whether he knew of what was going on and closed his eyes to it in the idea of removing Natalie's hopes, or whether he was really a partner in the crime is something that will never be elicited; but certain it is that nothing was ever suspected by the rest of that household, until it was announced that M. Pierre's sickness was mortal fatality, and several of his relatives were sent for. Among those who came, though not sent for, was one Dr. Edwards, a distant cousin on the side of M. Pierre's. He was a man of science, educated in France. He arrived, and within an hour, at the bedside of his kinsman, his suspicions were aroused. He was a man of sense and executive energy, and within another hour the servants had been examined and questioned, and the result was an appeal, privately, to the authorities in behalf of Natalie, without finding the mysterious black vial, and the confinement of the young lady to her room.

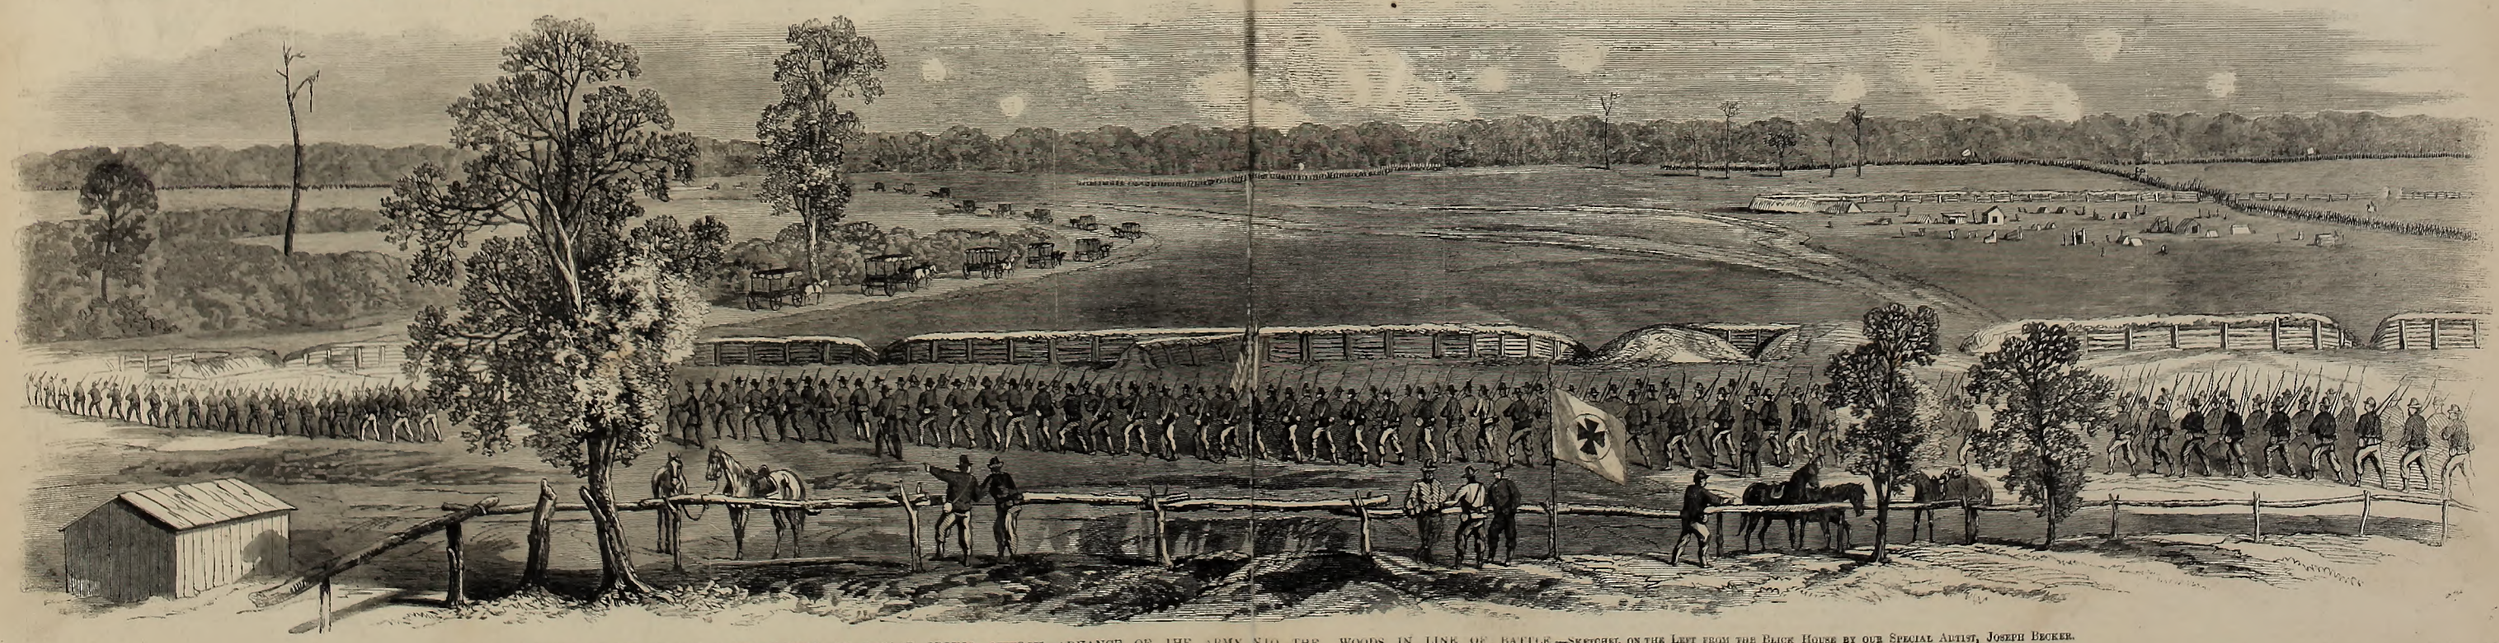
The physician who had attended M. Pierre was then interrogated, and the inquiry went on. It was shown that during all the time of her father's illness Natalie had never left the house but to walk in the adjacent gardens, and though every chemist and druggist of the city was examined, none of them had sold her poison or drug of any kind, save the prescriptions written by Dr. Edwards, the attending physician, which were always sent by a servant. Natalie's maid had brought her letters from Waterton from the Post Office, and during the sickness no express or package had arrived. The letters of Waterton were found to have nothing to criminate them, save here and there a mysterious line, referring to the time when her father "must consent to their marriage, if she, Natalie, would but continue steadily on."

Natalie was asked for an explanation of these passages, and beyond fainting spells, and utterly passionate tears, and fainting spells, and with shrieking supplication to be allowed to see her father.

At last, when it was found that no skill could save him, the fact was announced to her, and her terrible grief was aroused from where she was and allow her an interview, alone, as she requested. Those who ushered her into the room with the dying man only saw her clasped in his arms, both crying and sobbing, when the door was closed and they were left alone for an hour. What transpired, or what confession was made in that hour none ever knew. It was the left for the room she was rigid and deathly pale and tearless.

"Poor child," the old man only said, "she is innocent. God rest her father. God only knows the misery she must endure. I charge you that she must not be troubled any more, she is innocent!"

And an hour afterwards M. Pierre Dussaint was dead, an announcement that found Natalie in her chamber prostrated by grief, a deep sigh from an opened vein, and hardly able to acknowledge her understanding of the intelligence.



No other interview with her father ever given. If an analysis was ever made of M. Pierre's stomach the result was not made public, but those who were present at the time formed a theory that Waterton had sent poison to Natalie in a letter, with directions to administer it to her father, and that it was a charm to bring about his consent to their marriage, and that the confiding girl believed it and acted accordingly.

This is the only hypothesis ever arranged for the double death that there were who believing that Doctor Edwards knew more of the matter than he chose to tell, finally drove him from New Orleans to some obscure locality.

POVERTY A RELATIVE TERM.—Bulwer says that poverty is only an idea, in nine cases out of ten. Some men with $10,000 a year suffer more for want of means than others with $800. The reason is, the richer man has artificial wants. He income is $10,000, and he suffers enough from being cheated for unpaid debts to kill a sensitive man. A man who earns a dollar a day, and does not run in debt, is the happiest of the human race. Very few people believe this, and we believe this, but it is true as God's word. There are thousands who are poor because they are rich—who never know a moment's peace because they live above their means. There is really no poverty in the world among working people than among those where called rich.

FATE.

BY MAUD.

Forms and lost within an hour,
Hope's bright star no longer gleams;
I have seen him, and another
Claims the ideal of my dreams.

On his kingly brow hath Nature
Placed a regal crown she brought
From the treasured store of Genius,
Set with gems by Learning wrought.

Lord, forgive my adoration!
Of thy perfect work in him;
Surely I were more than human
To avoid that moment's sin.

Life's fair morning have I squandered,
Hoping for this priceless gem.
Now, alas! to find it sparkling
In another's diadem.

Is it strange that I should covet—
This command should be forgot?
"Anything which is thy neighbor's Henceforth thou shalt covet not."

Oh, remember, ere you censure
My involuntary sin,
Could I, unmoved, to those tones listen,
Which the hearts of all did win?

NINA MARSH;

OR,

THE SECRET OF THE MANOR.

CHAPTER XVIII.—CONTINUED.

MEANWHILE Katie slept on, and the night wore away. A grey chilly dawn poured in at the windows, giving a strange pallor to the bright face of the sleeping child and on Nina's arm. Nina had scarcely moved all through the night, lest she should disturb those quiet slumbers, but now she slightly raised herself, and beckoned to Mrs. Trent. The housekeeper got up and came to the bedside, leaning over the child for several minutes. When she at last rose she was very pale.

"Did you hear any sound just now?" she asked.

"Any strangle or movement?"

"She sighed two or three times in her sleep. Don't disturb her, Mrs. Trent," added Nina, apprehensively, as the other stooped down again to she bed.

"Nothing will ever disturb her again," replied the housekeeper in a tone of solemn earnestness; and then Nina knew that the little one she had loved, almost as a mother loves her child, had been taken from her by death. She lifted the wan, still face from her bosom and laid it on the pillow, kissed softly the motionless lips, and then went away to meet her new grief alone, and battle with it as she best could. But as she passed Captain Marsh's room she heard her own she found the door ajar, and Cyril came out.

"I have not attempted to go to bed," he said; "but I dared not intrude upon you in the sick room. How is Katie?"

Nina gave a helpless look up at him, and struggled to speak.

"I know what you would say," continued Cyril, drawing her close to him, and holding her tight, "I feared it must be so before morning; but Nina, we have not lost Katie; we know that 'it is well with the child.'"

"But it is so hard to part with her," said Nina, striving with her tears.

"I can understand that perfectly, for I loved Katie as much as if she had been my own sister. But there is something very hopeful in the death of a little innocent child. I know it is hard to part with her—hard for me, but much harder for you. Yours we must try and realise her gain, and remember it is very great. She gives us up, but she gains in return for this sacrifice a happiness immeasurably above anything we could have hoped to be obtained for her here. Try and feel that."

"I will. Thank you, Cyril, for being so good to me; but it would be best for me to go to my own room for a little while."

"I think it would; but you won't make yourself ill, Nina? Recollect that you are Katie's charge to me, and I am to take care of you. I will give you an hour to yourself, and then put on your bonnet and come and join me on the terrace. You have had no sleep to speak of for several nights, and a little walk would do you more good than anything."

But Nina felt all the better now for his kind words and protecting manner. The bitterness had gone from her heart, as she deeply felt his healed her wounds. After a time she went down, as he had bidden her do, and they paced the terrace silently together for a full hour. Then Cyril drew her in-doors again, ordered the breakfast, and poured her out a cup of strong coffee with his own hand. He did not force her to eat, but with respect to the coffee he was perfectly obdurate. And she was repaid for the effort afterwards, for she felt calmer and stronger all through the day than she could have believed possible.

Mr. Marsh would not acknowledge, even to himself, that he could have any particular love for daughter above another, but certainly in his heart of hearts he loved Katie better than the other two. Katie's obedience had always, of necessity, been unquestioning; whereas Madeline's indolence and Nina's wilfulness had each angered him at times in different degrees. She was the child of the house, too, and we all know how desolate the house is where children have been, and no longer are. Mr. Marsh was one of those men who grow stern in their grief. Those who did not know him might have thought him angry instead of sorrowful. He made a few conscientious efforts to comfort his wife and instil into her mind the philosophy of quiet endurance; then he fled from her tears as if they stung him, shut himself up in the library, and worked hard at his accounts.

Madeline barely knew what to do. She did not suffer inordinately, but she had an idea that it would look better for her not to appear absorbed in her work as heretofore. Finally she came to a compromise. She devised a mourning screen, which consisted of a large tomb in white wool, with a black pyramid, and on this Madeline worked with infinite relish and a clear conscience.

Nina suffered greatly, but Cyril was by her, and he was teaching her gradually to find comfort and alleviation in doing her duty to others. Mrs. Marsh had no longer reason to complain of either want of affection or unfaithfulness on Nina's part.

"Will all this pay back the past?" had Nina said to Cyril the day Katie was laid in the tomb. She had been at her mother's side all through these sad and solemn preparations, and when Mrs. Marsh had cried herself into a restless sleep, Nina had crept down with a hursting heart to gain some comfort from Cyril. He drove her out in the morning scarf as she entered, and went to meet her with a smile.

"I need often to try and be gay," she said, in her plantive voice, and clinging close to his arm, "and I thought the past might be forgiven me; but I have never felt so much as if it really would be as I do now."

"Because you have never striven so earnestly before to do your duty, Nina."

"I suppose that is it. But duty isn't always easy. Ah! if one could only command one's thoughts as well as one's actions!"

"But, Nina, your present work is a labor of love."

"I know it is; but, Cyril, I did so want to be alone—to weep over my own way. Only to have to put one's own feelings entirely aside for others is hard."

"It is what we all should do."

"Yes, I know, but I am only a novice yet, Cyril, and sometimes I nigh, and sometimes I feel as if I must kick against the traces. I had made up my mind to follow Katie, and see the very last of her, and I could not."

"It would not have been right that you should; it would have been too much for you, my poor Nina. You were better at home. In tending Katie's mother you were doing more good, believe me."

Cyril spoke very quietly, but in his seared heart he was deeply touched at this dry-eyed misery. For Maude Ashleigh was leaving Ulm, and should see from the army and live with the . Hitherto Captain Marsh had opposed this wish, not being able to see clearly what was right for Nina. But when he found that he could bring some comfort to this desolate household, Cyril no longer hesitated, and Captain Marsh wrote to Maude Ashleigh a commission. He did not intend to live permanently at Beechwood, but hoped, in the course of a few months, when they should be better able to dispense with his company, to get some diplomatic appointment through the interest of the then prime minister, who was a connection of his mother's family.

CHAPTER XIX.—A TRIP INTO YORKSHIRE.

LORD GILLINGHAM, when on the scent of mischief, was always keen on the pursuit of prey. You might dodge him, get behind the shelter of a wood, throw lures in his path, fling him dainty morsels of every kind, but he would not turn out of the track. He would dodge as you dodged, smile at all your lures, and eat your dainty morsels running; but he never strayed from his cursed purpose for one moment, never let anything hinder him on the way. Although he had assumed anger and incredulity at the discovery made by Mr. Barkley Smith, he suspected at once the suspect before him of a speedy revenge. His great object was to discover the motive of this fraud, and the motive of a woman he knew was always a keen one. A man of Colonel St. George's position does not commit an act so compromising and dangerous without some very powerful motive. Lord Gillingham, of all, he thought it advisable to make sure that a forgery had really been committed, since people cannot be too subtly to work on suppositions, however strong.

Mrs. St. George had, it appeared, died, or, at any rate, had been reported dead, while Leslie was still village near Doncaster. His lordship had intended proceeding there at once, only an obstinate attack of gout had prevented him. A man of his lordship's build and habit; but no sooner had he received than he determined to put his plan into immediate execution.

The earl's little expedition caused quite a flutter of surprise in the servants' hall. The valet was not to accompany his master—a thing hitherto unprecedented—and he took with him only that a small carpet-bag of unpretending exterior. It was evident that his lordship meant to travel incognito. The valet was not to be the distinguished one in view. Lord Gillingham drank with unusual moderation the night before his departure, and rose early the following morning, looking a little fresher than his wont.

"When are we to expect your lordship?" inquired the valet, as he followed him into the breakfast-room to receive his orders.

"When you see me," said the earl, shortly. Then he turned round from looking out of the hasty visit to the stables. At half-past eight, to a second, he was in the carriage; at eleven o'clock the groom was left alone.

"Well, where did he take his ticket to?" was the inquiry that met him on all sides; for this sudden expedition, so peculiarly carried out, had, as we have said, excited great curiosity in the servants' hall.

"To London," answered the groom, elbowing his way out of the group that had collected about him. "What's the use of your bothering yourself about my lord's doings?"

"Or Mark's bogey?" said one of the maids, giving him a glance of sawcy defiance. "We all of us know he's as sour as a May gooseberry."

"And as green," said another maid, who had a personal slight of her own to avenge, and would not miss such an excellent opportunity.

"Whereas you're paller from jealousy," retorted the groom; and although Mark reddened her head, and looked as if she had never heard of such a thing, it was generally felt that Mark had had quite the best of it.

Meanwhile his lordship was travelling towards London as fast as an express train could carry him. On reaching the terminus he immediately jumped into a cab and made direct for the Great Northern Railway, where he took a ticket for Doncaster by the first train which was to start in half an hour upon starting. When he reached Doncaster it was, of course, late, and the earl could only eat a chop at the principal hotel, take a modified edition of his usual night dose of brandy-and-water, and go to bed.

The next morning, at about eleven, he ordered a carriage and drove to Woodcurt. It was a pretty little village, watered by the pebbly Don, and harbored within the shelter of some low grass hills. The modest village inn stood at the entrance of the village, and the river bounded the neat lawn in front, and reflected the clusters of violets, blue and white, that covered the bank. The house itself was hidden in a clinging envelope of ivy, and appeared to the earl's singularly comfortless eyes, as he drove up, truly enough, the walls were thin from age, and rejoiced in manifold cracks and crevices not needed for the purposes of ventilation.

Lord Gillingham got out of his carriage at the gate, and, ordering the man to put his horses at the inn, he walked up the little gravel path and knocked at the door. His summons was answered by a ruddy-faced little maiden, who was evidently not accustomed to see strangers, for she blushed, and trembled, and courtesied as if her wits had quite forsaken her and she was dubious as to when they might return.

"Is your mistress at home?" inquired the earl, in his sharp, authoritative way.

"Yes, sir, master's at home," she just managed to gasp.

"Could I see him?"

"Yes, sir, you can see master," returned the girl, but she made no effort to secure him the privilege.

The earl's patience was not exemplary, as we have had reason to see in his wife. When he found the stupidity of the rustic handsaiden increasing rather than diminishing, he took the liberty of following out his own suggestions, without any further help from the astonished girl. Pushing her from his path, he walked into a neat little sitting-room, the door of which stood invitingly open. "Tell your master I want to see him," he said, coolly seating himself in the best armchair before the very eyes of the astonished maid.

The girl immediately departed, and, in the course of three or four minutes, a tall, elderly gentleman entered the room.

"Mr. Caudlum, I believe?" said the earl, rising and bowing.

"That is my name, sir," answered the reverend gentlemen, bowing in his turn. "May I inquire to whom I have the honor of addressing?"

"My name is St. George, at your service."

"St. George—St. George?" muttered the other reflectively. "Surely I have heard that name before!"

A ray of evil light shot into the earl's eyes. Nevertheless, he managed to speak with calmest indifference.

"You may possibly have done so, for I have been upon the commission of the peace, and have passed some years of her life in this village, and was buried in your churchyard."

"Ah! that's it. Thank you, sir. I am always thankful to any one who will help me out of any dilemma of this sort. My head is gone from overstudy. I have no memory at all—none in the least."

"At the same time, I dare say you recollect Mrs. St. George, do you not?"

"Now you remind me of the name, sir, I do recollect Mrs. St. George; a very amiable person—very amiable indeed."

"She has been dead rather over a year, I think?"

"There, sir, I must own you get quite beyond me. I am totally incapable of dates; but I will look at the register."

"Thank you, I should be sorry to trouble Miss Dorothy," answered the earl, with unpressed irony; "I would not for the world feel sorry if I were to examine the register."

"So it would, sir. Excuse me for not having thought of it. I will fetch the register immediately."

Mr. Caudlum left the room as he finished speaking, and in a few minutes he returned, bearing a ponderous volume in his hand, which he set down on the table and opened at the year 1850.

"I can't trust myself at all, so far as dates are concerned," said Mr. Caudlum, "therefore I will leave you to find the entry you want; but, if I might be allowed to offer a suggestion, I should certainly say that Mrs. St. George could not have died in the year 1850, as I could not have recollected her so well at her burial had that been the case, as I should only have been two years old at the time; but, if you should find any difficulties in the way, I, of course, would, I know, be happy to give you any assistance."

"Thank you, I shall manage very well."

And the earl began to turn over the pages of the book before him quickly and eagerly. He knew that the supposed date of Mrs. St. George's death was the 13th of November, 1850, and he soon found the entry he sought, which accorded in every way with the extract in his possession. But it seemed to the earl that the figures here were also sadly crowded, whilst the difference in the formation of the two 1's was even more marked in this, too, was much paler in the second than in the first. Still this was small evidence; but suddenly the earl's face brightened with savage satisfaction. The next entry he found to be of an earlier date than the one preceding it, Mrs. St. George's funeral having been entered on the 13th, and the following one on the 7th. The earl called Mr. Caudlum to his side.

"Were you aware, sir," he asked, pointing to the register, "that you had made an error of precedence here?" He could mean to think that Mrs. St. George was buried on the 11th of November, and James Morrell, who directly follows her, on the 7th?"

"Dear bless my soul!" exclaimed Mr. Caudlum, sharply. "How could I have made such a mistake? I am quite sure it was so. I—I—what do you suppose can have caused such a wretched memory! And yet—excuse me," he added, reflectively, "this seems very strange. Some unusual circumstance must have occurred at this kind, and, although I cannot trust myself, I have always found that I could trust her."

"I have no doubt whatever that you made the entry correctly enough, but that the register has been tampered with since."

"Tampered with!" exclaimed the reverend gentleman, indignantly; "that is quite impossible!"

"Impossible so far as you are concerned, of course; but you must occasionally have visitors who are not to be trusted. Just now, for instance, I had expressed a wish to see and consult Miss Dorothy, you would have fetched her yourself, would you not?"

"I believe I should."

"Very well; then what more easy than for me to have made some slight alteration in the figures during your absence?"

"Sir," exclaimed Mr. Caudlum, looking painfully perplexed, and eyeing his visitor suspiciously. Lord Gillingham smiled.

"Do not be afraid of me," he said; "but pray try and recollect if you have had a person here lately—a stranger, or otherwise—and whether there was anything peculiar in his conduct."

Mr. Caudlum shook his head.

"I will ask Dorothy. I assure you I am not to be trusted. I am a very small counsel to—"

Mr. Caudlum got as far as the door, when sudden thought struck him, and he returned, caught up the register, and carried it away with him.

"But surely it would save you some trouble if you were to ring for Miss Dorothy, instead of going for her yourself," said the earl.

Five minutes later there was a shuffling sound in the hall, betokening some slight want of unanimity on the part of the parson and Dorothy; then the door opened, and Mr. Caudlum came in, holding his refractory daughter by the hand.

She was a tall, handsome girl, of about sixteen, with unkempt hair and pale, watery blue eyes, which looked as if they had cried over difficult lessons until the brightness had been studied out of them. Her lips were open in expression, and her hids were ordinarily downcast over the pale, shy eyes; but every now and then she caught a glance of audacious power which irradiated the strange, wild face, and gave it a sudden grace and mobility. Altogether Dorothy seemed an interesting, peculiar and decidedly original.

"Dorothy," said Mr. Caudlum, loftily, "this gentleman having heard of your wonderful memory, wishes to consult you upon a subject of special interest to himself. Sit down."

Dorothy obeyed.

"I should be sad Miss Dorothy," said his lordship courteously, "if she remembers any stranger visiting this house during the last year."

"Yes," returned the girl.

"Was it a lady or gentleman?"

"A gentleman—tall, six feet high, squinie nose, dark brown eyes, curly hair—almost black—and whiskers."

"Very good," commented her father—"quite clear, and I have no doubt, accurate. You can by my own wife, Dorothy, in order that she, personally, may counteract my deficiencies. Is there anything more you recollect about the gentleman, Dorothy?"

Dorothy reflected a moment.

"He wore a blue cravat," she said.

The earl looked contented—the whole description tallied notably with the colonel himself.

"Anything further?" again questioned Mr. Caudlum.

"He wore a ring on the third finger of the left hand."

"Can you remember what sort of a ring it was?" inquired the earl, with a red glow on his sinister face.

"Yes; it was of virgin gold, with a large diamond in it, cut in the shape of a pear."

"There—I told you!" exclaimed Mr. Caudlum, with a delighted glance at the earl. "Dorothy is remarkable. Go on, Dorothy, if you have anything more to say."

"I don't think I have."

"You couldn't tell me, I suppose, what day of the month this person came?" said the earl, with an insinuating smile.

"You do Dorothy injustice," interrupted her father. "I can answer for her being capable of that much. Tell the gentleman, Dorothy."

"It was on the 21st of August—exactly nineteen months ago."

"And he called here, and asked to see the register of deaths?"

"He did."

"Can you tell me if he was left alone at al during his stay?"

"Yes, he was."

"Had he a pen and ink?"

"Yes, for my father had just been writing out the certificate for him, and left both pen and ink on the table. I remember this particularly, for the gentleman blotted the tablecloth, and Eliza—Eliza is the servant—and I had to take out the stain with salts of lemon."

"Thank you. I am very much obliged to you for this information. If you will answer me one more question I will not trouble you any longer. Can you tell me how long the gentleman was left alone with the register in this room?"

"For close upon seven minutes I should say. My father came for me because they wanted to know some of the particulars of Mrs. St. George's death, and I was translating Zachylus's 'Medea' into English verse, and didn't want to go; and then we quarrelled about it; and at last my father pulled me by the ear, and as he did to-day," concluded Dorothy, resentfully.

"I am sorry to have put you to inconvenience," said the earl, with the courtesy he could so well assume at times. "Allow me to thank you for your information, which will be of great service to me; and now I hope I may not keep you from your studies any longer."

And he rose, bowed, and wished her good morning. Dorothy gave him one of her shy, gleaming looks, and dashed out.

"Now, sir," said the earl, when he and Mr. Candlum were once more alone together, "you see that I was correct in my surmise. The person whom your daughter describes so accurately altered the date of Mrs. St. George's death for some purpose of his own. I hope to discover it. We may be very certain that you would not have inserted Mrs. St. George's name first in the register if she had not been buried before James Morrell."

"I remember nothing of this," answered Mr. Candlum, looking distressed. "You had better wait a minute, and let me recall Dorothy."

"It seems too bad—" began the earl.

But Mr. Candlum was already gone, and soon returned, accompanied by Dorothy, coming as a willing witness this time. She had plastered her hair blue close to her cheeks, arranged her disordered dress, and tied a fresh red ribbon round her neck. Dorothy looked quite good-looking, and was pleasantly conscious of the fact.

"Dorothy," said her father, "we should be glad to know if you recollect anything about Mrs. St. George's death."

"She died on Thursday, and was buried on a Monday. I remember it distinctly, because it was the first day of the month; and your old clerk, James Morrell, died just after the funeral very suddenly of heart disease, and was buried quickly on the 7th. I couldn't be mistaken about the date, it is all so perfectly clear in my mind."

"That will do, Dorothy; you may go," said her father, waving his hand in sign of dismissal.

But Dorothy was in no hurry to depart. Confident as to the effect of her red ribbon, she wished to linger to note her triumph. The earl's courtesy had brought back, by a sudden inspiration, the old days of her first meeting of pleasure admiration which she had hitherto smothered in Latin declensions and Greek particles. Poor child! these sensations had a most inopportune birth, for the earl noted nothing of her little feminine artifices to gain his attention, and was quite absorbed in his own scheme of revenge.

Presently Dorothy left them, having received another reminder from her father; and then Lord Gillingham also arose, thanked Mr. Candlum for the information he had given him, and took his leave.

A SUBMARINE VESSEL.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: I have been down in the submarine vessel recently invented and manufactured in this city by S. S. Merrian, and just tested by himself and the Government agent from New York, and as the following account of his experiences: "Entering the circular vessel from the top, the door was closed, and the order, 'Men, to your places,' given to the little crew, who promptly obeyed. When everything was ready, Mr. Merrian opened the screw valves and the compressed air came hissing in, producing an unpleasant sensation upon the drums of the ears, which was soon relieved by negating and swallowing. The vessel seemed perfectly steady, and then she dropped when half gone to the bottom, and raised the door on the bottom of the boat, but the water came pouring in so much faster than from coming in, even enough to wet the soles of our feet. One of the men hastily improvised the opportunity to dive out and come up on the surface of the water, since, to the astonishment of the spectators on the bank. He afterwards remarked and acknowledged from the bottom, when the door was closed, another and heavier pressure of water came upon him, and were on the bed of the river, 30 odd feet under water, the distance requiring an additional pressure to resist the water with the door open. We could stand on the bottom of the boat and see the color of the grass at that distance under water could easily be read, by the light that came in at the glass windows. Bells ringing outside were also heard distinctly. To return to the rest of the trip, after the order of the people was necessary; the air rushed out of the bottom and the boat was quickly relieved of the water. We moved with a propeller easily under as well as upon the water, and all agreed that the vessel worked so completely that its success is undoubted."

DISCOVERY OF AN ANCIENT ROMAN DIVING WHEEL.

M. ADOLPHE SAISON gives a description in the Paris Presse of the discovery in one of the mines of Portugal of an old wheel which was doubtless employed by the Romans in the same way as its operation is carried on the mine. It is well known that the hydraulic works of the Romans surpassed in extent any of those of modern times. As that great people had not the use of either steel or gunpowder, they were sometimes compelled to carry it right through. In some of the mines of San Domingo they have long galleries nearly 6 miles in length, but in some places the rock was so hard that they were obliged to abandon that round the drift. Eight of the wheels have recently been discovered by the miners, and are now in possession of the company. These wheels are made of wood, the arms and felloes of which are of the hard, solid wood of oak, the floating remarkable for the lightness of its construction. It is supposed that these wheels cannot be less than 1,850 years old, and the wood is in a perfect state of preservation, owing to the immersion in water charged with the salts of copper and iron. From their position and construction these wheels are presumed to have been worked as treadmills by men standing with naked feet upon one side. The water was raised by one wheel into a basin, from which it was elevated another stage by the second wheel, and so on for eight stages. Established by M. Saisson in connection at the Academy of Arts and Industries. It is 21 feet 7 inches in diameter, and 19 inches across the face.

ONE DAY.

BY CHRISTINA G. ROSSETTI.

I WILL not tell you when they met,
In the limpid days of spring;
Elder boughs were budding yet,
Oaken boughs looked watery still,
But primrose and veined violet
In the mossful turf were set,
While meeting birds made haste to sing,
And build with right good will.

I will tell you when they parted:
When fifty dozens autumn sheaves were brown,
Then they parted, heavy-hearted;
The full rejoicing sun looked down
As grant in the fields before—
Only they had lost a crown;
Only to them those days of yore
Could come back nevermore.

When shall they meet? I cannot tell,
Indeed, when they shall meet again,
Except some day in paradise.
For this they wait, one waits in pain.
Beyond the sea and land they live
For ever, yesterday, to-day.
Angels shall ask them, "Is it well?"
And they shall answer, "Yea."

THE MYSTERY OF THE WELL.

NOT many miles from Holworth Hall there is an old road, never occupied from the main road—"St. Swithin's Well," famous for the icy coldness of its water in the warmest of seasons.

In the year 1795, Mr. Barnard, an old gentleman who lived at Greendell, chanced to be walking, alone, near this well. He was followed by a huge mastiff of the true old English breed. The dog appeared the bearer of his wife's and Richard loudly. His master's attention was attracted, and he proceeded to ascertain the cause of the animal's excited state. To his surprise, he beheld an infant of about a month old, wrapped in a costly brocaded silk scarf, and girdled with a broad blue ribbon. Mr. Barnard was startled at the discovery, and he called to some laborers who were at work in a field hard by. They came to him immediately, but they were unable to give him any information. They declared that they had seen no one come or depart on that day.

What was to be done with the child? It was evidently nobody, when the dog gave the alarm; but the barking had aroused it, and it cried lustily. Mr. Barnard had several children of his own, but he had a horror of all other people's, especially young ones; and, while he rejoiced in saving the life of the little being, he was rather sorry that he had not left all other people's to their fate. However, he ordered one of the laborers to carry the infant to Greendell.

When he arrived at the gate of his home, he told the man, who was carrying the child, to stop for a few minutes, in order that he might prepare his wife and family for the reception of the little stranger.

He gave his wife a detailed account of all that had passed, but he could not get her to believe a single word.

"Nay, nay, Thomas," she said, "that won't do. The brat shall not be taken here. The story is too unlikely for me to credit."

"I protest, my love," he replied, "that I know no more about it than the man in the moon. Your reasonable fears are quite without object. Here is the child. Look at it—poor thing!"

The old lady was exceedingly obstinate, and not easily persuaded when she had once arrived at erroneous conjecture. The cries of the infant, however, pierced her kind heart, and she took the little creature up in her arms, and began to caress it. The servants thronged about the babe—especially the kitchen maid, and one of them managed to console it very effectually, and afterwards to hush it to sleep.

There was an elderly lady in Grassfield who had, by her youthful days, been a favorite Maid of Honor to Queen H. She was a shrewd and clever person, and a sort of general adviser in all cases of difficulty. She was sent for as a matter of course, and was soon on the spot, and, after mature discussion, relative to the parentage of the foundling, was kept up in the kitchen. Every one surmised, conjectured, but they did not get at the truth. Suffice it to say, that, if great folk deserted their young in this way, it was hard to punish the likes of them for the same misdemeanor.

The lady of county experience arrived, and inspected the child with praiseworthy coolness, while she was about to say on whom the pedigreemage probably rested.

"He seems a fine, healthy little boy," she remarked. "And, bless me, how smart he is. Well, I declare!"

"What?" asked Mr. Barnard and his wife, in the same second.

"Why, that ribbon belongs to a Knight of the Garter!" she exclaimed. And she peered up at the ceiling.

"You don't say so?" said Mr. Barnard.

"It is," she repeated; "and, what's more, it has been a good deal worn! And this scarf," she added, "is shaped to some person of rank. That is very evident."

"I trust, my love," said the old gentleman to his wife, "that you now believe what I say."

"I don't know what to make of it," she replied. "It is the oddest thing I ever heard of."

The circumstances soon were spread, and for months were the theme of the whole country. Every young man of fortune was set down as the reputed sire; and no child in this world ever had so many mothers assigned to it.

The boy was christened Joseph, and surnamed Swithin. He was kept by Mr. Barnard till he was some four years old, and was then sent to school in York. The old gentleman would have kept him in his house till he was older; but the number of persons who called and begged to see him, out of curiosity, made the charge extremely inconvenient. I should mention that one morning a letter was received by Mr. Barnard from a banker in York, to the following tenor:

"SIR—You will be good enough to know that a person, who calls himself Master James Smith, has deposited in my hands the sum of three thousand pounds, which he has requested me to place to your credit, at the same time, to tell you that you will know how to dispose of it. Dated, at York, March, A. D. 1767."

That the money was sent on the boy's account, was very certain; and for his benefit it was immediately invested to the best advantage.

The boy grew up. The interest of the three thousand pounds was expended on his education, and, on his attaining the age of twenty-one, he was placed on one of the old peninsula of Holworth. He soon became a partner in the house. He died, some years ago, at the age of eighty, after amassing a very large fortune, which he bequeathed between his wife and the Foundling Hospital in London. He lived a quiet life, and was remarkably attentive to his business.

The earnest wish to discover and to ascertain who was his father was not a whit less than that which Marryat implanted in Japhet.

At elections, fairs, public meetings, and at all other gatherings of influential people, he was always to be seen, with the original broad blue ribbon across his breast, and not unfrequently carried in his hand the identical scarf in which he had been found near St. Swithin's Well. But he never discovered, and no clue to his paternity was ever discovered.

An now, gentle reader, having told you thus much, I will tell you a mystery which you may believe or not, just as you please.

The people of the part of the country I have named, declare to this day that St. Swithin's Well has been haunted, for the last ninety years, by a fair spirit, who is sometimes seen looking down into the wells, as if anxiously searching for something under the bright near Holworth Hall.

Very few persons can be tempted to cross that road after dusk, for they approach the house which was once owned and occupied by Lady Bosworth.

The ghost has been described to me by several men, who profess to have seen it, as "a tall and beautiful young woman, of, maybe, twenty-two or twenty-three years of age, with long black hair and large dark eyes; high cheek bones and a very straight nose."

About eleven years ago I was staying in the house of my friend Barnard—the representative of the old gentleman who found the boy. At a large party, which consisted entirely of young people, the above named was told the story for the benefit of those who had never heard it before."

Several asserted that the foundling was the son of the wrong, and others asserted the well; whilst a number laughed convulsively at the idea of the belief which prompted such a supposition, and of Lady Bosworth's share in it. The conversation became loud, if not boisterous.

An officer belonging to a regiment of dragoons, then stationed in a town about nine miles off, was at the party of which I am speaking. He called out to our host, from the other end of the table:

"Have you seen the ghost?"

"No," was the reply.

"Have you ever been to the well at night?"

"No; but I have passed the bridge often, and I confess I saw no ghost, though I looked for it."

"Did you ever hear any reasonable man say that he had seen it?"

Several.

"Who are they?"

Barnard mentioned several gentlemen whose names might be known.

"Oh! they were not sober, you may depend," cried out three or four who took a warm part in the conversation, and who were frequently sneered.

The officer who led the opposition got up and said:

"I will go and look for the lady; though I do not mean to say that will settle the dispute, because ghosts are very fickle, and will not always 'come when you do call for them.' Will you send anybody with me that knows the spot?"

"It is more than two miles off," said Barnard.

"Never mind. Lend me the gig. It is a beautiful moonlight night."

"Well, I'll drive you down to the bridge," said the host.

The gig was ordered; the two men lighted cigars and drove off, amidst the laughter of those who remained to ridicule the expedition.

After an absence of about the space of an hour, Mr. Barnard and the officer returned to the room where they were all sitting. They were received with a loud and unmeaning "Hooray!" by the anti-spiritualists.

The officer was pale and agitated. His silence was that of a man who has seen that which he filled a bumper of sherry and drained it.

"Well, Jack, what is she like?" asked one of the party.

"She is something like Mrs. Randall," he said, mysteriously; "but taller and younger-looking."

"Then you did see her?"

"I did."

The greater number of us laughed, and said:

"Oh, you are evidently in the same condition as those other people were in when they saw her."

Mr. Barnard remained silent; and the officer who was perfectly sober, after making a solemn and awful adjuration, spoke as follows:

"I jumped out at the bridge and looked under it and all around it. I saw nothing. Barnard pointed out the direction of the well, and thither I went. I walked boldly up to the brink, and there I beheld the figure of a woman, sitting with her face hidden by her hands. I confess I felt a little nervous, but I plucked up my resolution and rapidly reasoned with myself. I approached to within about five paces of her, and said: 'What may you be doing here?' She arose and came close to me, stared vacantly in my face, and smiled. I shrugged with the fear that came over me, and tried to speak again, but could not. After staring at me for a few seconds, she turned and looked about the ground. She stooped several times, as though she were in the act of taking something up into her arms. Her agony appeared intense when she found the object of her search was gone. She knelt and looked down the well. Disappointment and horror were depicted on her countenance, and she glanced inquiringly at me with the keenest look I think you ever saw. My senses here failed me. I became giddy, and how I got back to the bridge I know not. For full five minutes I flew the figure. She was dressed in the richest court dress; and I heard as distinctly as possible the rustling of the silk as she walked about the length of the well. I shall never be ashamed to tell this; nor would I scruple to take my oath to the truth of what I have stated, in any court in the kingdom. As for being tipsy, no one ever saw me the least affected by wine; and as for being led away by my imagination—as some one just now suggested—every one who knows me will admit that such is not very likely. I walked to that well with as much confidence as I would walk into my stable—I returned from it scarcely as I have mentioned."

"All the old people declare," said Barnard, "that, whoever she might be, she is the real mother of that child which my ancestor found near the well, and whose history I gave you this evening."

"I have nothing to add," said the officer; "I am a perfect stranger here; and I have only described to you what I saw plainly as I ever saw anything in my life."

THE NEW FRENCH RAM THE SPHYNX.

THE impenetrable ruler of France not inaptly calls the ram which we illustrate in this week's paper the Sphynx. As a memorial of himself it will deserve to stand.

France has striven for two centuries manfully but in vain to weather the prow of a ship. Richelieu's "Florent quoque lites jentes" is beautiful, but has seldom been realized.

Never, heretofore, has France been so formidable on the ocean as now. Her armored vessels, combining the velocity given by steam, the solidity of iron, the history and the greatest security against an enemy's missiles, are, we fear or tremble to say, the best in the world, but they will prove in action to be to soon.

The Sphynx built at Bordeaux, by Mr. Arman, whose establishment is fitted for the most extensive work in iron.

She is a ram, having a prow of cast steel under water capable of resisting the strongest shock, but which is intended to strike below the armor.

She has a length between perpendiculars, carrying a 800-pounder Armstrong gun, which is expected to pierce the strongest armor at a mile and a half with two 50-pounder guns of the same make.

She has twin propellers screws and steering apparatus, and can thus turn readily, in a length of peculiar shape.

Her engine is 300 horse power, and she is expected to make nine knots an hour.

The illustration below her at the Cale of St. Orsk ready to launch, and also under sail. We also give a section showing her interior arrangement.

THE BATTLE OF POPLAR SPRING CHURCH, SEPT. 30.

OF Friday morning, about 8 o'clock, the 1st and 2d Divisions of the Corps, with Col. Hoffman's Brigade of the 3d Division, moved out on the road leading toward Poplar Tree Church, with the intention of attacking the Rebel right flank and rear. Crawford with the remainder of his Division and some new regiments, was ordered to the left of Hoffman and left of the 5th Corps, having Gen. Ferrero's Division of colored troops from the 9th Corps detailed to his command temporarily. The resolve to attack was made at a late hour.

When Gen. Warren reached the Church, of which a few boards still remain, and where a Rebel battery was establishing his line, Gen. Parker of the 5th Corps came up with the 2d Division, and formed on the left, and forming on Warren's left, struck the Squirrel Level road nearly a mile, and perhaps a quarter of a mile, from the advance into which, our Artist graphically portrays. The very first shot from the Rebel battery struck a file of the enemy, and a small and unfinished work, carrying 4 guns, but from some unaccountable reason, failed to throw any fire from them.

Everything in our front ready, the lines were ordered to advance, and after a brief defence on the part of the enemy, the works were carried by the charge of Gen. Griffin's Division, capturing one gun and a few prisoners, consisting of dismounted cavalry and artillery, sent from Heath's Division. Of this charge Gen. Warren said: "A more splendid charge never was made by any troops in any war." Our sketch will enable our readers to form their own judgment. Our Artist, looking through the option field in the foreground our guidon bearer and the Rebel battery beyond, from which the hollow ground upon the rebel fort and line. Another sketch is one of the 5th Corps, showing the line of battle as the first of all spring upon the gunner.

This gun and others taken by the charge then thrown forward, Gen. Parke on the left, with Wilcox's Division joining the 5th Corps, and Potter's Division the extreme left. This line explored by five miles minus was very nearly defended and incomplete. Our loss was trifling.

Whether this movement will result in driving the enemy made a mass movement, and succeeded in encamping part of a brigade of Rebel cavalry within a few hundred prisoners. At this critical juncture, some troops from the Corps were ordered to attack and checked the further advance of the enemy. These two brigades were early ordered to the left, and the 5th Corps left in time. The rebels failing to make any very serious impression upon the left, still continued to attack our troops loaded themselves all night in throwing up entrenchments, which are now in a very strong position.

A concluding sketch shows what to the soldiers was a cheering sight, the arrival of rations from Grant's railroad on Saturday. These pushed on through the 5th Corps and 2d Division to Gravelly Run, crossing Poplar Spring Church, a distance of two miles, and thence on to the newly captured work had a safe harbor.

SCENES OF ARMY LIFE—DEALING OUT LIQUOR TO SOLDIERS IN THE TRENCHES.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, E. F. MULLER.

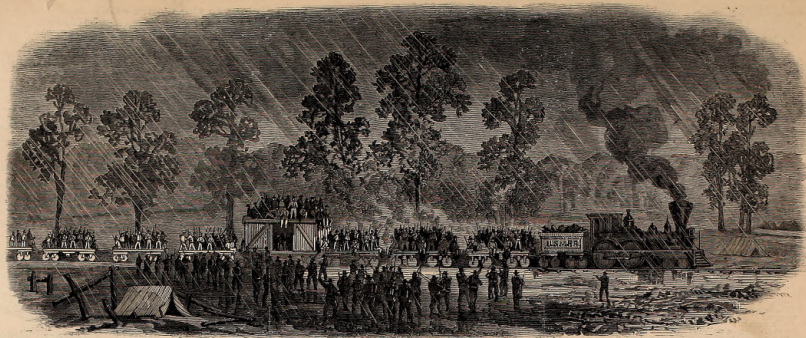
CAMP SCENES.

The Coming Election in the Army.

The loyal States, with few exceptions, having made new laws to recognise the right of soldiers to vote while absent from their several States in the service of the Government, and to establish the necessary regulations for this exceptional vote, the military authorities have issued the following regulations from the office of the Adjutant-General:

"In order to secure a fair distribution of tickets among soldiers in the field who by the laws of their respective States are entitled to vote at the approaching elections, the following rules and regulations are prescribed:

"1st—One agent for each army corps may be designated by the State Executive, or by the State Committee of each political party, who, on presenting his credentials from the State Executive, or the chairman of said committee, shall receive from this department a pass to the headquarters of the corps for which he is designated with tickets, or proxies, when required by State laws, which may be placed by him in the hands of such person or persons as he may select for distribution among officers and soldiers.



"2d—Civilian inspectors of each political party, not to exceed one for each brigade, may in like manner be designated, who shall receive passes on application to the Adjutant-General, to be present on the day of election, to see that the elections are fairly conducted.

"3d—No political speeches, harangues or canvassing among the troops will be permitted.

"4th—Commanding officers are enjoined to take such measures as may be essential to secure freedom and fairness in the elections, and that they be conducted with due regard to good order and military discipline.

"Sh—Any officer or private who may wantonly destroy tickets or prevent their proper distribution among the legal voters, interfere with the freedom of the election, or make any false or fraudulent return, will be deemed guilty of an offence against good order and military discipline, and be punished by a summary dismissal or court martial."

Our Artist sketches a new scene in camp —A group of soldiers, reading and commenting on the election posters stuck up, and now for the first time bringing the polls to them, as they could not go to the polls.

Dealing Out the Liquor Ration.

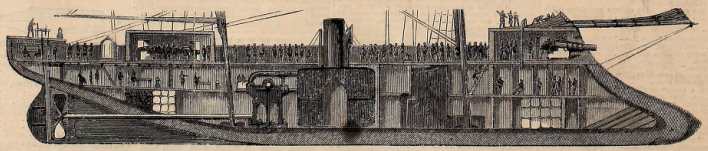
The work in the trenches, which is so constant and unremitting, and on which so much depends, could hardly be carried on without giving the soldiers some stimulant. We give a sketch of the dealing out what is deemed a safe ration to the brave men who so readily do their part in this toilsome and uninspiring work. The effort to dispense entirely with liquor, in the damp and unhealthy districts where an army is too frequently obliged to operate, has but increased the amount of sickness, and Government, taught by experience, acts with moderation and wisdom.

SCENE IN MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT,

At the Olympic Theatre, N. Y.

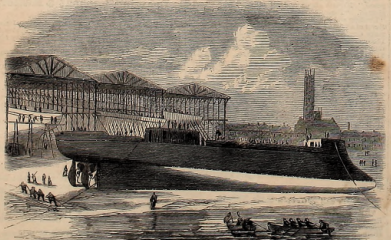
THE new dramatic rendering of Martin Chuzzlewit which has met with such success at Mrs. Wood's Olympic Theatre has some scenes so irresistibly ludicrous that we give our readers an illustration. Pecksniff, that creation of Dickens which has become the type of hypocrities, has exposed himself in the dinner at Todgers's by a little too free indulgence, and the united efforts of the boarders have carried the sufferer from "chronic" disorder to his room. His reappearance at the head of the stairs, his address to Mrs. Todgers, revealing another vice in his character, are followed by the sudden descent which we see depicted.

No description can, however, give our readers the convulsing merriment which is ever excited by this scene when rendered as it is at Mrs. Wood's Theatre.



AUSTRIAN MILITARY BAND ON THE MARCH.

AN AUSTRIAN MILITARY BAND ON THE MARCH.



AN Austrian drummer, if this French illustration may be taken as a pure and truthful portraiture of nature, takes life easily. While the schlarr toils along under his load of musket, knapsack, haversack and what not, our drummer does not pretend to carry either drum or drumstick. He has a little sled or car drawn by a dog, on which he places the musical instrument confided to his care by the State, and even makes his beast of burden carry the drumsticks. All goes bravely on till some other dog picks a quarrel with the one thus honorably employed in the state service, and drums must occasionally suffer in the war that ensues.

ROYAL EXAMPLE IN ECONOMY.—Queen Elizabeth of York, the wife of Henry VII., though she paid the board of her married sisters to their husbands, and furnished her maids-of-honor with gambling money, practised the personal economy of having her own dresses turned and mended. Henry VII. was the English king to whom Columbus applied for aid in his great adventure.

THE FRENCH IRONCLADS—THE NEW FRENCH RAM THE SPHYNX.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A FREQUENT excuse put forth by persons asked to sing is the declaration that they would be delighted if they could remember the words. As words, in the present style of singing, really matter very little, we give the following verses as a sample of the kind of thing that may be sung by people with short memories:

Oh, if I had lumty tum lumty tum too,
In the land of the olive and fig,
I would sing of the lumty tum lumty tum to you,
And play on the thumpany jig.

And if in the lumty tum bottle I fill,
A tumti tum of the tiddy cove—
Oh, hurry me deep in the wheayoomay call,
And plant the lumpaloola over my grave.

In case this should be too great an effort for the memory, we have dashed off the succeeding trifle, which, by a clear and loud delivery of the ends of these lines, the hearer will imagine he knows what he is about:

Dumty, dumty, dumty love,
Dumty, dumty, teary,
Dumty, dumty, dumty prove,
Dumty, dumty, part.

Dumty, dumty, dumty, meet!
Dumty, dumty, coy,
Dumty, dumty, dumty, greet,
Dumty, dumty, joy.

AN INQUIRING MIND.—Professor Gunning, the lecturer on geology, was discussing the primary schools of one of our city reforms recently, by showing what he condemned and what how he was made. He had finished it by trusting in the sting, when a little fellow, who had been watching the process most closely, spoke up:

"Mr. Runner?"

"What, my boy?"

"Didn't you also the bee?"

"Yes, certainly. God made the bee."

The little fellow was silent a minute, when he spoke up again:

"Mr. Runner?"

"Well, what now, my son?"

"I was thinking," said the young philosopher, "how God could make the sting into the bee without hitting his fingers sting before he let it do."

That child ought to be encouraged.

CONSIDER THE RISE!—Sam is our steward; and not content with being the prince of stewards, he occasionally dabbles a stroke of business in the money-lending way among the men. The other day one of the men on the ship, who borrowed some money of Sam, which coming to the ear of the officers, some of them bore him to task about it.

"Sam," said the skipper, "how much interest do you charge?"

"Not much, sir," said Sam.

"Well, how much?—50 per cent.?"

"Oh, dear, no, sir."

"Fifteen?"

"No, indeed, sir."

"Ten?"

"No, no."

"Well, five, then?"

"Good gracious, sir!" exclaimed Sam, in holy horror, "do you take me for a Yankee?" (Nobody, for probably meanest.)

"Well, then, how much do you charge?" asked the skipper.

"Well, sir, I tells you; I let him have five pounds for three days, and I only charge him two pounds ten to interest."

"Sam, you scoundrel!" exclaimed the skipper, "you are a high-flier."

"But think of the risk, sir," said Sam, in extenuation; "think of the risk. Why, the man was in the doctor's hands."

The hand followed at the expense of our worthy surgeon may be imagined, not described.

TRUTH AND FICTION.—The Archbishop of Canterbury said one day to Garrick:

"Pray inform me how it is that you gentlemen of the stage can so easily express with things imaginary as if they were real, while we of the Church speak of things real as coldly as if they were imaginary, or at least unlikely imaginary."

"Why, my lord Garrick, "the reason is plain. We actors speak of things imaginary as if they were real; while too many in the pulpit speak of things real as if they were imaginary."

His grace bowed to the respect of the actor.

SIMPLEX MUNDITIIS.—A Southern planter named Brown, pretty well to do in the world now, was some 20 years ago, a poor boy on the eastern shore of Maryland. One of the strongest and most marked traits of his character was an inordinate love of money. While he was at the academical school of the people in them diggins, where they practice skinning strangers during the fall season, and shaving one another during dull times.

In the course of time P—— was of age, and thought it about time to get married. He went to a neighboring village, and in the course of time was introduced to the daughter of Judge B——.

"Dog me, dad," said the embryo speculator to his friends, who were gaining him an entrance among the ribs.

"Very."

"How much might Judge B—— be worth?"

"Why, about $10,000," was the reply.

"How many children has Judge B——?" continued the inquirer.

"Only three."

"Three into ten goes three times and a third over," unanimly achieved [illegible].

Here was a chance—a glorious chance—and he improved it to the full. He made love to the beautiful and philistical daughter of the judge with all his possessions—three, by the way, for we are smooth-e looking cub as ever went unlicked, his suit prospered, and they were married.

The honeymoon passed off as all other honeymoons do, and then he was happy. The bride was lively and chatty, and often made allusions to her brothers and sisters. Being by some means he thought should not be in the catalogue of relations, one evening at tea he said:

"My dear, I thought there were only three of you?"

"So there are by my own, but my pa's first wife had eight more."

"Eleven into ten, no times and nary one over!" said the astonished P——, who jumped up and kicked over the chair, and groaned in great agony. "I am ruined! I'm sold! and—and a sight cheaper than an old bellwether cheap at that!"

He left, and married reviewer finds a passage that he pretends to think not worth the ink and paper used in publishing it, he is very sure to use as much more in roughshing it.

SNAKE STORY.

We extract the following thrilling tale from a volume of adventures recently published in Europe. The hero of the scene is a sailor, who, with companions, were on an East India island, preparing to leave, but could not finish a sail they were making. He says:

We worked hard, and being burglers, much of the work had to be done over night, for fear of ruin-ince. We were, however, pretty near the end of our job, when an adventure befell me, the recollection of which, is preduced in dreams, often makes me start up in bed in a cold sweat of horror. It was about 10 o'clock, quite correctly, in a popular periodical, probably by some one who had been there, and I assure you that it is not thus fill out. The sail, a big sail, did not set well. I my self, and several hands, were hanging on to each subject than the others, remained by the boat, whilst my mates returned to the ship, forgot in all made themselves comfortable. I worried on till I had tremendously wearied myself. The Southern night, with its glorious moon and fields of splendid stars, was brilliant as day, though cold for the climate. A chill wind having set in immediately after sunset.

This, with the work I had been doing—cutting and stitching the sail—did not induce warmth, so that I panted more freely than it was my wont to do of the excellent brandy I had provided myself with. At all events, that evening, I could not so set the sail as to bend it on the ship-shape, and perhaps more than half the case over (I was not an inexperienced man in those days), lay down just under the lee of the boat, took a few pulls at the brandy flask, and dropped off to sleep. Sleep! yes, the sleep of devils! Frightful, horrible dreams oppressed me. I was struggling with nightmare. That was the impression on my half unconscious mind. And I fully awoke. Good God! the icy chill which ran through my veins, when I, by brilliant moonlight, discovered the cause of the nightmare which was sitting me.

Fright, horror, mortal fear, suffocating and [illegible] sensations of the sailor-like, on the largest I had ever seen, were by no means unusual—where they had no doubt crept for warmth—twined together, and being of enormous size, were, I judged, taking to stay to awake them, was certain death. In less than an hour, if I was taken over-board, I should be a mass of corruption. Paralyzed, fainting with fear, I lay perfectly still, in the feeling that the dreadful suspense could not be long endured, and I must soon start up and cast off the horrible reptiles by my rise. They were comfortably asleep, and might be flung at a distance before they had time to make use of their fatal fangs.

This merciful God they begin to stir—to wriggle from each other, and to crawl.

It is that the creeping, chirping hark of our pet monocose (chameleons) which alarms the reptiles? Let me explain.

The monocose is the natural enemy of snakes, and in a combat with one is sure to be the victor. The bite of the snake produces but a momentary effect upon the little animal—seems to make it giddy for a few moments, when it seems to recover itself by eating her by-eating some of the herbs, of which there is a disputed point. However it may be, the monocose gently returns to the attack, and the snake, as I was told, is invariably killed.

The snakes around me themselves almost as plentifully as snakes. Lazzaro and Dupont managed to bune had almost succeeded in their very difficult task—knowing that not one of the serpent tribe will approach where they have been, and, recently, no more than a cockroach will venture out of its hole in a chink to save a hedgehog. Once wakid and wholly free, the chameleons were special pets of mine, and were their, causing the serpents and themselves to be in fear and fright; their hoots dilate as they unwrist themselves, glide off on the long grass, and the serpents had no possible, turn to fight. The chameleons desire nothing better. They attack the snakes, bite them on the back part of the head, and carry on the battle, if such it is, in a deliberate manner, with a spirit, a cheerful, chirrupy vigor, which is, I feel sure, thoroughly actually enjoyable. I never saw, before, a sure augury of success. The battle is not a long one. Generally in half an hour, they are quite running after and leaping up at me appear to know that their enemy is routed and will not have to reward an even more plentiful supper than usual. They are not mistaken. Our friends and fellows gradually excited by the incident which had, however, so happily terminated, and, as I said, I was not myself again for several days. I never sought in the open air again.

A SMOKING AUTOMATON.—Many men smoke mechanically, but we never heard of one before smoking by mechanism, as is related in a recent work by authors. The Salem Gazette says: "Mr. Thomas B. Russell, an ingenious gentleman of this city, has made a machine of his friends a curious piece of mechanism, which is now at his rooms in No. 164 Street. It consists of the figure of a man, seated in a common chair, and having a cigar in his mouth. By winding up a spring, and thus setting in motion an ingenious piece of machinery in the body, which passes in the mouth of the figure, are made, at regular intervals, to emit a steady stream of smoke, as required with grace by a professional smoker could not excel. By this process a cigar will be smoked up as quickly and naturally as sitting man could do it. The machinery by which the result is accomplished consists of a series of levers, not unlike those by which a clock is made to strike. Rubber tubes are put in connection with the mouth of the figure and bellows, which are slowly worked. Two valves, nicely adjusted, regulate the drawing in and emission of the smoke.

MANY a man is "blackballed" by those who are scarcely fit to perform that operation upon his boots.

Punch to Dr. Felix Gouraud,

High Priest in the Court of Venus.

MOST ESTEEMED DOCTOR—The fame of your wonderful discoveries, which have realized all the dreams of the alchemists and the enthusiasts of the Rosy Cross, and incontestably prove that you have penetrated to the inner mysteries of the production and preservation of the Beautiful, has spread far and wide among our female worshippers and subjects. They have directed me to convey to you, on behalf of the convocated States of Beauty throughout Europe, their heartiest thanks for your magical Cosmetics and preparations, by the use of which woman renews her empire, defies the approaches of her ancient enemy, Time, and proclaims indefinitely her radiant reign. To you, the Lily tells the Wise, therefore, do we extend the good right hand of fellowship, and name you our Royal Cousin. Long may we both continue to reign in our respective realms—you presiding over the empire of Beauty, while we direct the sparkling current of Wit and Humor—perfecting thus, in conjoint and pleasant harmony, the mingled and mighty destinies of man and woman.

Thine, in the bonds of Royal Brotherhood,

Punch.

Done at our Paper Palace.

P.S.—As an additional token of our personal respect, we herewith transmit you a copy of our august portrait.

The Last Resort.

KING SOLOMON, a wise man in his day and generation, were he now alive, would write among his proverbs, not that "there is nothing new," but that there are many new things "under the sun." He would recognise this Southern rebellion, for the perpetuation and expansion of slavery, in the name of liberty, as a new thing. He would record, as a new thing, and somewhat infamous withal, the active sympathies of England in this war, that foremost champion among the nations of negro emancipation; and as something decidedly new and unique, the establishment by a Frenchman of a Dutchman as Emperor of the Mexicans, and of their own free will at the point of the bayonet. He would pronounce this Southern revolt against an indulgent and beneficent Government a blunder as great as the crime, and as wholly without a precedent in its perverseness and wickedness, except in the rebellion of Absalom against his father. He would declare, as a new thing under the sun, the setting up and knocking down of King Cotton, and as something never known, heard or dreamed of before on the face of the earth, the proposition lately broached in the rebel capital, of arming 250,000 negro slaves to fight for a Southern Confederacy, the whole fabric of which, from its turrets to its foundations, is negro slavery.

This is the last resort. This is the desperate alternative to which the thoughts of the leaders of the rebellion have at length been drawn. The Davis Confederacy, reduced from its original area of over 800,000 square miles of territory to less than one-third this imposing usurpation, and from its original hold upon 12,000,000 of people to less than 4,000,000 within its lines, more than one-half of which are negro slaves, is groaning at last under the still increasing pressure of the unbroken strength of the Union. Davis leaving Richmond, his chosen capital, in imminent danger of capture, with the shipwreck of all his fortunes, hastens to

Georgia, to provide, if possible, against the danger which threatens him there. While in Richmond he is accused of abandoning Georgia to her fate, in Georgia he is suspected of abandoning Richmond to save himself. In "defining his position" to the Georgians, he confesses that two-thirds of his enlisted soldiers "are absent without leave," that he knows not how to recover them, and that his last reserves are exhausted. He implores the harassed and suffering women of Georgia, and the old men and boys, to come to the rescue. He confesses his forlorn expectation of Sherman's veteran and victorious armies, numbering 100,000 men, by the decimated army of Hood, reduced to its numerous heavy defeats and constant desertions to less than 30,000 men.

These astounding disclosures and stultifications are made in the presence of the whole nation prevailing at Richmond, from the steady approaches of Gen. Grant's encircling columns. No reinforcements for Lee! Only the poor women, and the old men and boys of Georgia to come to the rescue! No means, no available bodied white material left! Two-thirds of the Confederate soldiers deserters or stragglers! What, the Richmond Enquirer may well ask, what are we to do? Driven to these fearful extremities, no other resource remains than the Southern slave population. The fact is recognised, and in its blind and impotent rage the Enquirer asks for the arming of these slaves, with the reward of their personal freedom for their services in the work of binding their families and their descendants in perpetual bondage.

Could any evidence be desired more conclusive than this to prove that "the backbone of the rebellion" is at length in reality broken, Gen. Grant, what was of the opinion that it would be broken with the arrival of the available Legislature of Maryland; Secretary Stanton thought it was broken with the capture of Vicksburg and the reopening of the Mississippi river; while many of our enthusiastic fighting war journals have pronounced this extraordinary backbone of the monster broken at least a half a dozen times in as many different places, still the monster is "like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along." But when the most authoritative organ of Jeff Davis is pushed to an appeal for the fearful alternative of arming the Negro slaves to fight for slavery, there can be no doubt of its significant meaning. It simply means that the rebellion is in its dying contortions. If the white soldiers of Davis doesn't like drafts, as from a hopeless cause, his blacks, if tried in this capacity, would desert by thousands. They will not, however, be provided with the means or the instruction that would enable them by regiments to move across the lines. Their masters cannot be induced to deliver them up for such a suicidal experiment, and the Enquirer, in proposing it, only betrays the important fact, under the present circumstances of the desperacy are exhausted, and that there is nothing left it now but Samson's alternative of vengeance, of pulling down the temple upon himself with the Philistines. This unpromising ending is this to that boasted Southern Confederation, founded upon the corner-stone of African Slavery, and daunting its defiance in the face of the entire mankind, as the predestined arbiter of the nations under King Cotton!

In conclusion, this appeal of the Richmond Examiner for the arming of the black reserves of the "Confederacy" to fight for it, ends the discussion of this branch of the negro question, at least, in favor of the policy pursued by our Federal Administration. Whatever opinions the intelligent and dispassionate reader may have entertained heretofore on this subject, he must now admit the sagacity of Mr. Lincoln, in strengthening our wasted armies from the swarms of Southern "contrabands" fleeing to our military control. This was his last resort; and the chief of arms of Jeff Davis, in urging the same expedient as the last resort of the "Confederacy," puts an end to the African debate, and admits the failure of the rebellion.

ENIGMA.—Zerelda—Matter Fulcral—To a Friend—An Acrostic—Bachelor Friend—Shall We Love Again?

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA—GRANT'S ARMY.

On the 9th of October the skirmish line of the 6th corps was pushed forward three quarters of a mile.

On the 10th the 9th corps made a reconnoissance a mile and a half in front of its position.

On the 11th there was heavy firing.

Rebel deserters still continue to come into our lines in large numbers, all heavily sick of the war.

The rebels have upon every battle-field in Virginia, during hundred times over so very puny a matter as the rise of a river, left their dead.

Briskly, we do not believe in the numerous profits declared to be made by speculators, the President of the 6th Avenue road, as an instance, counting out, over his own signature, and declaring that for months past it has cost the road to run its passenger trains what has been received for them, a declaration that we are strongly inclined to believe. Secondly, we think it but a small return for the service we render and see how all things else have risen, and so assume that in not really opposing the Erie bill, which, if it has any fatality, terrifies persons, who are always glad of an opposition that will create a wordy quarrel, or bring them before the public. This public, as a general thing, is a patient, lickable donkey, seldom or never kicking back, save at some one know, and then only with a noisy, donkeyish bray.

The stages have been up to date, and the public have submitted quietly to this rise of nearly 70 percent, and quarrels vehemently only as cars for parking on twenty. "Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel!"

And speaking of a petty war, we are reminded that the feud between the railroad and the employers still rages, and that the well-known belligerent nature of the journeyman tailor has exhibited itself in various instances. The employers meet in secret session at Clinton HALL, and while they debate dire destruction to the Sullory Union, the journeymen hang round Astor Place and Broadway, vowing vengeance and wasting their athletics on the external of the depleted pockets of the employed.

We look upon this movement as only the inauguration of what will be a general war in the New York trades—but as the combined action of the employers against the employed, brought about by the abuse of workmen. However serviceable such unions may be for a short period, and to attain some special end, when used as a permanent remedy for extortion of labor, they are worse than useless, and swell upon the horror.

While speaking of "Unions," our attention is attracted to that of the Working Woman's Union, and their appeal to the public for aid during the coming winter. In this union there is room for true philanthropy, an unfortunate field, where not only the sufferer is taken from perdition, and aid much physical comfort to those of those sex alone, but where also there is the co-operation of manly generosity, and of the assistance of his strong arm. The Working Woman's Union is at No. 16 Chambers street, where they solicit cash and employment from those of kindly feeling.

Several times in this column we have spoken of the mysteries of New York, and the apathy of the police toward all such mysteries as require a labor of research and patient watching, by a scant reward to assist the authorities. A few weeks since we mentioned the finding of a human head in the street and a leg to match floating in the bay, and then withheld fact to some particulars which never took place by the authorities: but now we have more detailed information to supply, and as there is some hope that daylight will be let in on it, we allude to the finding of portions of a dismembered body in the bay, and river, and the finding in Sixth avenue of part of the trunk sewed up in a cloth, with piece of iron enclosed, but not enough to identify the murdered, disclosing in the same condition, but milder degree, a leg, a hand and a mass of flesh. This was also repeated at intervals until all of the body was brought to light but the head, which, as in most cases like these, have utterly destroyed, so as to prevent its identification. It seems wonderful that such acts can be committed in our very midst, but a moment's consideration will show what a great city it is, and how very place for such concealment and the centre of a crowd the most likely spot for a well executed crime to pass unnoticed.

The past week has seen the breaking up by the police of one or more gangs of men, for some time annoying the public, the manufacture and circulation of bogus currency. During the past few months no one could not have a few dollars at small change pass through his hands without getting them, and in some of these villainous transactions. They came mysteriously from some unknown counterfeiting source, to shopkeepers and other like gentry, but how did it go so generally as they came. Why, in the form of counterfeit money is one demanding serious consideration, the spelling of which in this case has caused a revival of the old cry, "the knave, as the ancient fraternity of queer shovers" are called, out of the small mistakes which the heads of small dealers who fail to conduct it in person. Many a man is ruined by these bogus bills, and a corner run until, or pedlar, or steamsaloon keeper, or the like, is driven to the wall, or to the poor-house. One of the oldest instances of it came to light on Friday last, in the case of a poor old woman, a rag-gatherer, for stealing from a prisoner, when it was searched for evidence, a sum of counterfeit money returned to them, would sometimes contain the amount of money originally lost, and the thief was seized with it a fair assortment of bogus that was not in it when left.

From talking of the police it is but a step to that of thieves. A prominent detective, one in answer to whose name would be a warranter for a thorough understanding of the subject, tells us that never before in New York more given up to the fraternity of thieves than at present, and that of them, many are at large, luminists on the street corners, especially about Broadway, Bowery and Houston, by which they are dressed in the highest style of fashion and setting all law and supposition at defiance. It is a wonderful mistake to look for a New York thief under a ragged or shameless garment. Rarely must he be so, of a thief indeed if he cannot in a few days by flashy appearance in a city swarming with greenbacks and uncondemned trifles of value, cover himself with sufficient to make him secure, possibly passing a brilliant of fine water upon his finger or upon his bosom, that is, if he is a successful thief, and not some day our detective spots him, taps his shoulder, and he goes to the penitentiary, not having provided for a rainy day cannot be sufficient cause, for another will come, and with the experience and a consequence settles the whole affair at a rural residence up the Hudson at a cost of about $2,000.

At this moment New York is forcibly raised up between parties and money making. Its coming elections are breaking out in spontaneous ward meetings, and the air is full of three supernumerary and full volumes, several small boys, who cannot raise money to go to the theatre, but who are ripe for any excitement, and various ball-rousers and orators, who take the opportunity to "spout," not their own, but their words. Then comes a torchlight procession, in which prominently figure the boys, and the fun commences in earnest, and as a consequence settles the whole affair at a rural residence up the Hudson at a cost of about $2.

TOWN COSSIP.

NEW YORK city should be like Napoleon I., unable to afford a small war, but not always does she work upon that belief. The character of her people partakes largely of the English, though it go no further than a more restless, fighting, approaching an encroachment upon the sovereignty of the individual. This stamp of character, upon every restriction in the way or imposed upon in his pocket, at once, if he can afford the luxury, appeals to a jury, and if unable, or with a disinclination, to the lawyers to the Tombs or Fines, which answers the purpose of relieving his mind.

All this is suggested to-day in petite guerre carried on by the public against the Erie, and the company and conductors of its city railroads, in consequence of the new car rule of the 1st inst. We do believers in the people contesting their rights, no matter how petty, and we are also of a belief that the additional cent upon the fare is illegal, and yet in defiance the fact of the people of a great city like New York losing temper in the matter, or having financial times over so very petty a matter as the rise of a cent, is to us a mystery.

Briefly, we do not believe in the numerous profits declared to be made by speculators, the President of the 6th Avenue road, as an instance, counting out, over his own signature, and declaring that for months past it has cost the road to run its passenger trains what has been received for them, a declaration that we are strongly inclined to believe. Why, in the form of counterfeit money is one demanding serious consideration, the spelling of which in this case has caused a revival of the old cry, "the knave, as the ancient fraternity of queer shovers" are called, out of the small mistakes which the heads of small dealers who fail to conduct it in person. Many a man is ruined by these bogus bills, and a corner run until, or pedlar, or steamsaloon keeper, or the like, is driven to the wall, or to the poor-house. One of the oldest instances of it came to light on Friday last, in the case of a poor old woman, a rag-gatherer, for stealing from a prisoner, when it was searched for evidence, a sum of counterfeit money returned to them, would sometimes contain the amount of money originally lost, and the thief was seized with it a fair assortment of bogus that was not in it when left.

From talking of the police it is but a step to that of thieves. A prominent detective, one in answer to whose name would be a warranter for a thorough understanding of the subject, tells us that never before in New York more given up to the fraternity of thieves than at present, and that of them, many are at large, luminists on the street corners, especially about Broadway, Bowery and Houston, by which they are dressed in the highest style of fashion and setting all law and supposition at defiance. It is a wonderful mistake to look for a New York thief under a ragged or shameless garment. Rarely must he be so, of a thief indeed if he cannot in a few days by flashy appearance in a city swarming with greenbacks and uncondemned trifles of value, cover himself with sufficient to make him secure, possibly passing a brilliant of fine water upon his finger or upon his bosom, that is, if he is a successful thief, and not some day our detective spots him, taps his shoulder, and he goes to the penitentiary, not having provided for a rainy day cannot be sufficient cause, for another will come, and with the experience and a consequence settles the whole affair at a rural residence up the Hudson at a cost of about $2.

At this moment New York is forcibly raised up between parties and money making. Its coming elections are breaking out in spontaneous ward meetings, and the air is full of three supernumerary and full volumes, several small boys, who cannot raise money to go to the theatre, but who are ripe for any excitement, and various ball-rousers and orators, who take the opportunity to "spout," not their own, but their words. Then comes a torchlight procession, in which prominently figure the boys, and the fun commences in earnest, and as a consequence settles the whole affair at a rural residence up the Hudson at a cost of about $2.

TOWN COSSIP.

NEW YORK city should be like Napoleon I., unable to afford a small war, but not always does she work upon that belief. The character of her people partakes largely of the English, though it go no further than a more restless, fighting, approaching an encroachment upon the sovereignty of the individual. This stamp of character, upon every restriction in the way or imposed upon in his pocket, at once, if he can afford the luxury, appeals to a jury, and if unable, or with a disinclination, to the lawyers to the Tombs or Fines, which answers the purpose of relieving his mind.

All this is suggested to-day in petite guerre carried on by the public against the Erie, and the company and conductors of its city railroads, in consequence of the new car rule of the 1st inst. We do believers in the people contesting their rights, no matter how petty, and we are also of a belief that the additional cent upon the fare is illegal, and yet in defiance the fact of the people of a great city like New York losing temper in the matter, or having financial times over so very petty a matter as the rise of a cent, is to us a mystery.

Briefly, we do not believe in the numerous profits declared to be made by speculators, the President of the 6th Avenue road, as an instance, counting out, over his own signature, and declaring that for months past it has cost the road to run its passenger trains what has been received for them, a declaration that we are strongly inclined to believe. Secondly, we think it but a small return for the service we render and see how all things else have risen, and so assume that in not really opposing the Erie bill, which, if it has any fatality, terrifies persons, who are always glad of an opposition that will create a wordy quarrel, or bring them before the public. This public, as a general thing, is a patient, lickable donkey, seldom or never kicking back, save at some one know, and then only with a noisy, donkeyish bray.

The stages have been up to date, and the public have submitted quietly to this rise of nearly 70 percent, and quarrels vehemently only as cars for parking on twenty. "Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel!"

And speaking of a petty war, we are reminded that the feud between the railroad and the employers still rages, and that the well-known belligerent nature of the journeyman tailor has exhibited itself in various instances. The employers meet in secret session at Clinton HALL, and while they debate dire destruction to the Sullory Union, the journeymen hang round Astor Place and Broadway, vowing vengeance and wasting their athletics on the external of the depleted pockets of the employed.

We look upon this movement as only the inauguration of what will be a general war in the New York trades—but as the combined action of the employers against the employed, brought about by the abuse of workmen. However serviceable such unions may be for a short period, and to attain some special end, when used as a permanent remedy for extortion of labor, they are worse than useless, and swell upon the horror.

While speaking of "Unions," our attention is attracted to that of the Working Woman's Union, and their appeal to the public for aid during the coming winter. In this union there is room for true philanthropy, an unfortunate field, where not only the sufferer is taken from perdition, and aid much physical comfort to those of those sex alone, but where also there is the co-operation of manly generosity, and of the assistance of his strong arm. The Working Woman's Union is at No. 16 Chambers street, where they solicit cash and employment from those of kindly feeling.

Several times in this column we have spoken of the mysteries of New York, and the apathy of the police toward all such mysteries as require a labor of research and patient watching, by a scant reward to assist the authorities. A few weeks since we mentioned the finding of a human head in the street and a leg to match floating in the bay, and then withheld fact to some particulars which never took place by the authorities: but now we have more detailed information to supply, and as there is some hope that daylight will be let in on it, we allude to the finding of portions of a dismembered body in the bay, and river, and the finding in Sixth avenue of part of the trunk sewed up in a cloth, with piece of iron enclosed, but not enough to identify the murdered, disclosing in the same condition, but milder degree, a leg, a hand and a mass of flesh. This was also repeated at intervals until all of the body was brought to light but the head, which, as in most cases like these, have utterly destroyed, so as to prevent its identification. It seems wonderful that such acts can be committed in our very midst, but a moment's consideration will show what a great city it is, and how very place for such concealment and the centre of a crowd the most likely spot for a well executed crime to pass unnoticed.

The past week has seen the breaking up by the police of one or more gangs of men, for some time annoying the public, the manufacture and circulation of bogus currency. During the past few months no one could not have a few dollars at small change pass through his hands without getting them, and in some of these villainous transactions. They came mysteriously from some unknown counterfeiting source, to shopkeepers and other like gentry, but how did it go so generally as they came. Why, in the form of counterfeit money is one demanding serious consideration, the spelling of which in this case has caused a revival of the old cry, "the knave, as the ancient fraternity of queer shovers" are called, out of the small mistakes which the heads of small dealers who fail to conduct it in person. well for the talent of the actor and the taste of the public.

Mr. Forrest is still at Niblo's, crowding the house three times a week, and will end his engagement on the coming Saturday, the 22d, after which comes Maggie Mitchell, with Fanchon the Cricket.

There has been an extra night at the Academy this week, possibly to make up for Tuesday, when there was no performance. "Il Trovatore," "Un Ballo in Maschera," and "Lucrezia Borgia," have been the operas of the week, in the second of which Mdlle. Frida de Gebele made her debut. This week we are to have our old favorite Clara Louise Kellogg, as Marguerite in "Faust," and on Saturday a Matinée will be given.

Heller gives us a new problem this week, nothing less than "The Troublesome Spirit in Scarlet," to which he especially calls the attention of all Spiritualists and believers in the supernatural. Heller has made a wonderful success in New York, though not an astonishing one when his talent and enterprise are taken into consideration. His new programme commences this week, and judging him by the past, we anticipate a few astonishers.

The Winter Garden still runs Mr. Clarke, and "The Two Dromios," with wonderful success and crammed houses.

This is the last week that the Thumb family will submit to public gaze. On Monday next they sail for Europe, and from that time exhibit no more. Barnum has already prepared mourning for the Museum, and has purchased half a yard of super crape to tie to the tail of the whale.

BOOK NOTICES.

Evan Dale. A Novel. Boston: A. Williams & Co., 1864. 387 pp., 12mo.

If the prices have risen publishers certainly produce their works in fine style. Seldom does a work of fiction appear in such beauty as Evan Dale. Paper, presswork and binding all bear witness to the taste and enterprise of the publishers. Evan Dale is a story of Boston life. The characters are numerous and well sustained, giving us interesting views of city society. The heroine, Grace Lee, and the realization of her ideal husband, stimulate curiosity to the end.

The Ocean Waifs; a Story of Adventure on Land and Sea. By Capt. Mayne Reid. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1865. 12mo., 366 pp.

This is another of the attractive boys' books which Reid has so happy a knack of producing. Books of adventure in the wilderness or the ocean are the literary food that boys crave, and Mayne Reid succeeds admirably in making this a vehicle for instruction and a means of inculcating noble and generous thoughts and aspirations. The standard of honor and dignity cannot be too high in works for the young of either sex.

The Poems of Bayard Taylor. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1865. 419 pp.

Bayard Taylor, who will long live as the American traveller, investing with grace his descriptions of even familiar lands, and familiarizing us with all, stands in no mean position among our poets. To the many who have enjoyed his poems, this edition in blue and gold, in all the beauty of the issues of Ticknor & Fields, will be extremely welcome.

Broken Lights. An Inquiry into the present Condition and future Prospects of Religious Faith. By Frances Power Cobbe. Boston: J. E. Tilton & Co.

This work is by the English editress of the works of Theodore Parker. Of her views there is, therefore, no question. Her problem is "the true grounds on which God will hereafter lead mankind to rest the faith in himself and his holy law and in a life beyond the grave." She very justly analyzes the condition of Christian thought, and makes the threefold division of all into those who believe in, 1st. An infallible abiding Church—the doctrines of the Roman Catholics; 2d. Prophets, such as the Swedenborgians, &c.; 3d. An infallible book, as pure Calvinists. The less logical who combine these she omits. Discussing the paleological answers to the problem in the Church of England, she takes up the neological and weighs all the modern movements of the liberal party in church doctrines.

The Life of Abraham Lincoln. New York: T. R. Dawley, 13 and 15 Park Row.

A popular life of our present President, giving the chief events of his career in a brief and connected way.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A salute of 100 guns was fired in the New York Park, on the evening of the 12th of Oct., in celebration of the Republican victories in Ohio and Indiana.

—— One of our best Generals of the United States army, who has unfortunately had part of his upper jaw carried away by a Minie ball, has had it replaced artificially by Dr. De Marini, of this city. The doctor's skill in these operations is well known, and the Russian officers availed themselves of his services during their stay here. The painlessness and gentleness of his manipulations are remarkable, and they have been attested by the most accomplished writer of the country. N. P. Willis, in a leading article in the Home Journal, gave his happy experience under "Rescue of a Tooth." We notice Dr. De Marini's return to his residence in East 34th street, and the resumption of his profession, after a long recess in the Far West, and the celebrated watering-place of his native State.

—— On Monday, the 10th of Oct., the fares on the cars and stages were raised to 6 cents in the former, and 10 cents the latter.

—— The 200th anniversary of the surrender of this city and its surrounding province to the English by the Dutch, and the attendant change of name of the former from New Amsterdam, and the latter from New Netherlands, both to New York, was celebrated on the 12th of Oct., at Cooper Institute, and notwithstanding the rain, there was a large assemblage of citizens. The most prominent feature in the exercises was an interesting paper read by Dr. Brodhead, giving a history of the transfer from the one Power to the other, and of the condition of the colony at that time.

—— The New York Herald recommends to the citizens of New York, that a farm be presented to Kearsarge Winslow instead of a silver testimonial.

—— A marriage for a consideration recently took place at the Methodist Church, Williamsburg, Mass., the bridegroom being a very handsome youth of 16, and the bride a rich and dashing widow of 34, who had buried two husbands already, the last of them being 78 years of age. The minister at first hesitated, but upon being assured by the bridegroom's father that it was all right, performed the ceremony. It appears the widow had conceived a violent passion for the youth, and that he returned it. She settled a large farm on the father, and $10,000 a year upon her young husband should he survive her.

—— All aliens are interested in the following, which makes them bona fide citizens, if they have been soldiers and honorably discharged:

And be it further enacted, That any alien, of the age of 21 years and upward, who has enlisted or shall enlist in the armies of the United States, either the regular or volunteer forces, and has been or shall be hereafter honorably discharged, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, upon his petition, without any previous declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and that he shall not be required to prove more than one year's residence within the United States previous to his application to become such citizen; and that the court admitting such alien shall, in addition to such proof of residence and good moral character as is now provided by law, be satisfied by competent proof of such person having been honorably discharged from the service of the United States as aforesaid.—Sec. 21, Chap. 200. Laws of the 37th Congress, 2d Session, page 591, approved July 17, 1862.

—— There are 127 Petroleum companies now in existence in Pennsylvania, representing a capital of 88 million dollars. There are about the same number in other parts of the country, representing about the same sum. It is consequently one of the greatest staples in the United States.

—— The Vermont Legislature met on the 13th of Oct. Hon. A. B. Gardiner was chosen Speaker of the House. The Senate elected H. Clark for Secretary.

—— The imposition practised by the conductors of the cars in demanding six cents instead of five led to almost a riot on the 14th, in car 55, 4th avenue. A passenger having refused to pay more than five cents, was told to leave the car, refusing to do this, the conductor attempted to remove him by force, the passengers joining the melée, other railway officials reinforced the conductor, a crowd gathered round, but after a quarter of an hour's disturbance, the passengers triumphed and the conductors were vanquished.

Southern.—Richmond papers of the 8th and 9th of October, say that, during Friday's battle every school, newspaper, department, storeshop and railroad was suspended, and every male person employed therein ordered to the front. The Examiner condemns the suspension of the newspapers. The papers all claim a victory in the attack on Birney.

—— The rebel President has received considerable condemnation for his unfortunate Macon speech, which, says the Budget of Fun, may be the un-Macon of him. The Charleston Mercury at first declared it a forgery, but when the Richmond papers copied it and commented on it, the South Carolinians were unanimous in their blame—the Mercury saying that he must have been mad. The most singular thing is that the Richmond press endorse it. This evidently proceeds from the fact that Jeff Davis delivered the speech in a Virginian point of view, since it is founded on the idea that every State ought to send troops to save Richmond, since if that goes all has gone. Gov. Brown, whom Davis called a scoundrel by implication, says that Mr. Davis's remark is founded on his ignorance of State rights.

Military.—A Union officer writing from Charleston, where he has been placed under fire by those inhuman monsters, says: "The Andersonville prisoners have been passing through this city. There are some 6,000 here now. You cannot imagine them. Eight thousand out of 25,000 died of disease at Andersonville during the months of July and August. Nineteen hundred of the 6,000 here are totally incapable of helping themselves. Most of them are insane! Fifty of our regiment went to Andersonville in April, and in July, when I last heard from a corporal of my company, there were but 12 alive; probably they are all dead by this time. I know all this to be a fact, from officers here who were confined in hospital with the men."

—— Gen. Rosecrans has taken the field in person in Missouri, having finally arranged his plans. Sterling Price, the rebel General, it is said, will not hazard a battle, but harass the Union troops in every possible manner.

Naval.—The London Times in an article on Farragut's action in Mobile bay, says: "We must now invite the public to draw a conclusion from this extraordinary trial of two things; either the armor of the Tennessee was superior to any of the targets which represent our ironclads, or the ordnance of the Federals is inferior to our artillery. We have already said that we do not think the former hypothesis could be maintained for a moment, and consequently we must close with the latter. This we do without hesitation, and we imagine that most persons acquainted with the subject would be prepared to affirm that the guns which penetrated the Warrior target would, at 10 feet distance, have smashed in the sides of the Tennessee before the action had lasted a quarter of an hour."

—— Admiral D. D. Porter took command of the North Atlantic squadron on the 12th Oct. in place of Admiral Lee, which event was signalized by a salute from the United States steamship Brooklyn.

Personal.—Pierre Soulé, formerly Senator for Louisiana and Pierce's Minister to Spain, has gone to Mexico on a diplomatic mission for Jeff Davis.

—— Mr. Adams, the well-known tenor singer of Boston, is thus announced at the Covent Garden Theatre, London: "First appearance of the celebrated German tenor, Herr Adam."

—— There is no truth in the semi-absurd report that Dr. Shelton Mackenzie has been appointed Consul to the Feejee Islands. It first appeared as a joke in a comic paper, from whence it was copied into the journals of the day as a piece of news.

Obituary.—Judge John D. Willard died in Troy, N. Y., on the 9th Oct., at the age of 64 years. He was a native of New Hampshire, graduated at Dartmouth College, and settled at Troy in the practice of the law at the age of 21. Gov. Marcy appointed him Judge of the Court of Common Pleas in 1834, and in 1857 was elected State Senator. For some years he edited the Troy Sentinel.

—— The venerable mother of John C. Breckinridge, of the rebel army, died in Baltimore, on the 9th of Oct. She had resided with her son-in-law, Rev. Dr. Bulloch, of the Franklin street Presbyterian Church, for the past two or three years.

—— Our European advices inform us of the death, at Florence, on the 17th Sept., of one of the most distinguished members of the English literary circles of that city, the aged Walter Savage Landor. He was born in 1775, and was therefore '89 years old. He was educated at Rugby and Oxford, but quitted the University without a degree. In 1808, he raised, at his personal cost, a body of troops in aid of the Spanish patriots, by whom he was created a colonel in the Spanish army. Since his marriage—with the exception of a few years at Bath—he has resided abroad, chiefly at Florence. Among his works, we may mention "Count Julian," a tragedy; "Gebir," an epic poem, which he afterwards translated into Latin; "Imaginary Conversations," in five volumes; and "Pericles and Aspasia." In 1857 he published "Dry Sticks Fagotted," which contained personal allusions to a lady in Bath, and occasioned great scandal, for which Landor was prosecuted and compelled to pay £1,000 damages. His last work was a small collection of verses in English and Latin, marked by all the characteristics of his peculiar genius.

—— Ex-Gov. Jared W. Williams, of New Hampshire, died at Lancaster on the 29th Sept. He was an old and respected politician, and in addition to being Governor for one year, he served two terms in Congress, and several terms in the State Legislature.

—— Mrs. Rose Greenhow, the well-known rebel, whose imprisonment at Washington, two years ago, made so much noise, was recently drowned at Wilmington, in trying to run the blockade. The steamer having run aground, she was put, with several other passengers, in a boat, to be taken ashore, when it was capsized, and she was drowned. She had been to Europe to publish her book on the war, and was on her return to Richmond.

Accidents and Offences.—On the 11th Oct. the Jersey police put a stop to a prizefight at Bergen Point between two New Yorkers. The principals escaped, but about 30 of the spectators were arrested.

—— A waiter at the Astor House Hotel was arrested on the 12th Oct., charged with having abstracted, last April, $2,480 of partially signed bank bills of the North Bennington Bank. $1,600 worth of the stolen money was found at his residence.

—— Some few days ago the middle portion of human body was found floating in the river. It was wrapped in oilskin. A day or so after two legs, belonging to the same body, were found at Gravesend Bay, wrapped in the same material; these legs correspond exactly to the upper portion of the body. The missing parts are the head, breast and arms. The only clue was a bunch of keys found in one of the pockets. There can be no doubt some atrocious murder has been committed.

—— Wm. Fischer, a Hollander, keeper of the shooting-gallery, 157 Chatham street, shot himself on the morning of the 13th Oct., at a wedding supper. The wounds are supposed to be fatal. Unrequited love was the cause.

—— An accident occurred on the 13th Oct. on the Hudson River railroad, near Manhattanville. Owing to the fall of a quantity of rocks and earth upon the track the up-train ran upon it, and was thrown over. Most fortunately none of the passengers were injured, although the carriages were a complete wreck.

—— A severe accident happened on the New Haven line, near 71st street, on the 10th, by which over 30 persons were severely hurt; among them Mr. and Mrs. Parke Godwin, of the Post, and others.

—— Two men were arrested, on the 13th Oct., in 6th street, N. Y., charged with being the counterfeiters of the 50 cent fractional notes. Nearly $30,000 worth of these worthless forgeries were found in their room.

—— The Quebec papers of the 11th say: "Between five and six o'clock this evening part of the rock in Champlain street, below the Citadel, fell and destroyed three houses and the inmates perished. The house of Mr. Hayden and Mr. Battle was entirely destroyed, and one occupied by Joseph Lesueur, ship chandler, was rent from the cellar to the attics. The street is filled with a sympathizing crowd, and everything is done to rescue the living and recover the dead. The following are the names of the persons who lost their lives: John Hayden, stevedore, Mrs. Hayden, Mary Hayden and Janet McCann; injured, Thomas Hayden, son of John Hayden above mentioned, and Mrs. McCann."

Foreign.—The Prussian soldiers now occupying Kiel are excessively addicted to smoking, and an anecdote is told of two riflemen who, in the recent campaign, popped at each other from behind two trees situated a short distance apart. Suddenly one of them, a German, held out a cigar, with a polite bow. The other, understanding at once, advanced half way, and was met by the German. In courteous silence the German lighted his cigar at that of the Dane. Bowing again politely, they withdrew to their respective places; and ten minutes afterwards, by some fatality, shot each other through the heart.

—— In Algeria an Arab aged 14 has been executed for cutting his wife's throat, aged 17. He said in his defence that she was bigger and stronger than he was, and that she beat him and pulled his hair. He committed the offence while she was asleep.

—— Louis Napoleon is encouraging the introduction of boxing in his dominions. For this purpose he paid the celebrated pugilist Ben Caunt to give a grand boxing exhibition at Calais lately. He is also engaged by him to give them in all the large cities in France. A French paper says it developes muscle and pluck.

—— Major Yelverton having sworn to certain tendernesses between himself and the far-famed Mrs. Yelverton, Capt. Champion, of the Melbourne, where they were said to have occurred, has emphatically denied the "gallant soldier's" statements, thus making him a perjurer as well as an absconding husband.

—— The summer has been so hot in Norway that salmon fishing had to be commenced at eight o'clock at night.

—— It seems after all that England has gone in for the Duke of Augustenberg, since Lord Clarendon, when he was in Berlin and Vienna, distinctly advised the Ministers of those countries to immediately install the Duke in his dominions. It will be remembered that Augustenburg is nephew to Queen Victoria, and a Coburg by marriage.

—— A couple of goats tied together were recently driven out of a man's garden, near Clonmel, Ireland. Startled by a stick thrown at them, they jumped the fence and alighted, one banging on each side of a colt's back. The colt dashed away, all three kicking furiously, and ultimately falling into a quarry and being killed.

—— The Duke of Nassau gave a dinner at Baden, lately, and just after the guests had sat down the party was discovered to number 13 persons. This "unlucky" circumstance terrified the diners, and ultimately the officer on guard was sent for to obviate it by his being added to the company.

—— Dr. O'Neill, of Lincoln, England, recently, by action at law, recovered three guineas fee from a neighbor who had written a letter purporting to be from a third person who required his services, but who was not ill. The sell did not pay in this case.

—— An ingenious Parisian has invented a boat in which a person can bathe, the water flowing through it, and move about at the same time—a sort of floating cradle, with a tent roof and sides, and a kind of band-propeller.

—— A memorial has been voted to Queen Victoria from the Ayr Town Council, complaining that people will persist in saying England when they mean England and Scotland. Dreadful attempt on the part of those Scots to control the right of free speech!

—— The London Times now and then changes its mind. Of the two opinions given below, both are wrong, for the South has made a desperate fight:

Look on This Picture—Nov. 26, 1860.	And on This—Sept. 14, 1864.
"It is evident, on the smallest reflection, that the South, even if united, could never resist, for three months, the greatly preponderating strength of the North. A few hundred slave owners, trembling nightly with visions of murder and pillage, backed by a dissolute population of poor whites, are no match for the hardy and resolute population of the Free States."	"We trust the public will admit that they have not been misguided by our comments on this obstinate contest. The great fact which we asserted from the first has now been placed beyond the reach of controversy. We said that the North could never subdue the South, and the North has now proclaimed the same conclusion."

Chit-Chat.—St. Peter's Church in Rome will contain 54,000 people; Cathedral of Milan, 37,000; St. Paul in London, 25,000; St. Sophia in Constantinople, 23,000; Notre Dame of Paris, 21,000; Cathedral of Paris, 13,000; St. Mark of Venice, 7,000.

—— The oldest officer in the French army is Colonel Dubois Fresney, Knight of St. Louis, and Commander of the Legion of Honor. He is 106, and although blind, he retains all his mental faculties.

—— The Old Blair has given an account of his interviews with Bryant, Bennett and McClellan, concerning the Chicago nomination. The visits were made without the knowledge of President Lincoln. He offered Gen. McClellan an important command if he would decline the Chicago nomination.

—— A correspondent says, "Anent Phrenology as a general thing, a man having a large head has more brain power than a small headed man; but this is not always the case, inasmuch as quality and organization exercise much influence upon the power of the brain. A small man may be so well made, as we call it, as to be much stronger than a large man. So a small head may contain such an excellent quantity of brain, and the brain may be so admirably placed, as to give the fortunate owner of the head much greater intellectual and moral power than might be possessed by a man with a larger head. Besides, the brain is to a great extent nourished by bodily forces exterior to it; and if these forces be weak in a given case, the brain will be lacking in vigor and power. Wherefore, this question of reading character by one's appearance comprises a vast deal more than a mere fingering of the cranium. The great use of phrenology would therefore seem to consist in pointing out to us our capabilities, and telling a man to act up to his bumps."

—— In these days of tercentenary festivals, and above all in the town of Elsinore, it is a great shock to one's Shakespeareanism to be told that Hamlet, properly "Amlet," was not the son of a king of Denmark, but of a pirate chief; that as a Pagan, living centuries before the Christian era, he did no more than his duty in revenging his father's death; that he by no means fell in single combat with Laertes, but lived to become Governor of Jutland, and to marry two wives, one of whom was daughter of an English king. The culminating point of this antiquarian heresy is that there was no Ophelia. To have one's faith destroyed in one of the sweetest characters that Shakespeare ever drew is a trial; but there is this consolation, leaving behind this picturesque town of Elsinore with its 8,000 inhabitants, nothing remarkable is passed on the road to Fredensborg with the exception of the ruined castle of Gurre, to which a tradition clings remarkable for its likeness in a double aspect to those connected with English history. In the 14th century Valdemar IV., like our Henry II., concealed in this sequestered nook from the jealousy of his Queen a Danish fair Rosamond, known as Tovelil, "Little Love." But whereas English history has been content to infer that Queen Eleanor, after the discovery, proved to her liege lord a sufficiently retributive thorn in the flesh, Danish story goes much further, and dooms Valdemar to the fate of Herne the Hunter, for having blasphemously declared that he should not desire Heaven if Gurre were left to him.

—— Punch is getting more and more dismal. We give the following as the gems of the last number:

Dr. Manning, Roman Catholic Provost of Westminster, lately preached, we hear, a most touching sermon. Most of his male auditors were in tears. It was remarked at the time that this was not like Dr. Manning's usual style, that it was, in fact, un-manning.

Passage from the Diary of a Late Physician.—The fellow got well before I came.

Notice.—The gentleman who, the other day, ran away from home without stopping to take his breath, is requested to fetch it as quickly as possible.

"All the world is at Baden-Baden," wrote a correspondent to M. Bismarck. "That can hardly be," said the minister, "seeing that I've sent the demi-monde away."

In most towns of the Continent you may be sure that a little good English goes a great deal farther than any quantity of bad French.

A WATERSPOUT AT SEA.

The barque Jane Doull, Capt. Smith, which arrived in the Thames on the 13th of September, from Bermuda, had an exceedingly narrow escape from destruction by a waterspout at sea.

She left Bermuda on Sunday, August 14th, and shortly after, the wind having fallen to a dead calm, she came to anchor off the Great Sound. "The evening," writes one of the passengers, "was sultry and overwhelmingly oppressive, not a breath of air rippled the water or cooled the hot atmosphere. The sun travelled down the west and disappeared, like a great circular patch of blood, behind a heavy bank of black clouds. The night was equally miserable. the heat intense; the wind was dead, the broad expanding water smooth as glass, and everything in nature seemed to denote some unusual phenomenon at hand.

"The morning came, but no change with it. Clouds of varied hue, but all sombre gray and black tinged, chased and gathered beneath the sky; the sun rose a ball of fire, and loomed in the distance like a redhot 68lb spherical shot. No wind, no ripple, no sign of change except perhaps for the worse. At seven the clouds gathered thick and heavy, and far in the distance we could see rain beating down on the sea in lines of water. Our attention was soon diverted from the rain. Capt. Smith and Mr. Virgin, the pilot, asked if we did not hear a distant roar, as if there was a naval engagement going on at some short distance. A dull, rumbling roar could distinctly be heard.

"We next observed, about five miles from us, a cylindrical column, reaching from the sea to the altitude of 500 feet. From our point of view it appeared about three feet in diameter. It was of a grayish hue, and assimilated in hue with the clouds above. It rested upon the water, and by the aid of our glasses we could distinctly observe the salt water ascending and the fresh water descending in torrents, the sea in a state of great agitation. Around this cylindrical column the wind seemed to be rushing with the force of a volcano. A smaller one, which appeared about this time, was apparently 'swallowed' by the larger one.

"For some 15 minutes we watched this remarkable and, to us, novel phenomenon. The pilot then pronounced it a waterspout. As we had never seen one we felt no alarm, till warned that if it struck the vessel we must save ourselves. While we were yet conjecturing what would be the result of this extraordinary formation, the great line of black clouds solemnly advanced on each wing of the spout. The rain was pouring in wild torrents, and then the spout dropped down its mighty weight of water on the pitiless sea, while the winds madly rushed it towards us. We now became alarmed. The roar of the falling waters came to us like the distant sound of Niagara; the sea was lashed into great waves; the waters poured, and bubbled, and rose in swaying masses over six feet in height. With deadly aim and certain purpose the awful column advanced. Not one on board the ship but felt the danger, and knew that nothing could save us if it struck the ship. Thank God! it burst about 30 yards from us, and the last remnant of water ceased about ten feet of the stern."

The best preparation for the teeth is the Fragrant Sozodont—it is the best because it is the safest. So many of these specifics are dangerous that we have pleasure in recommending the above.

Mr. B. S. Osbon, late naval editor of the New York Herald, has opened a bureau of naval information at No. 2 Dey street, in this city, where, for a moderate fee, he will furnish information respecting naval matters not conflicting with the laws of the Navy Department, and which the pressure of public duties prevents the Department and officers from affording readily. Mr. Osbon will forward letters, packages and parcels to ships in service on any stations. In fact, the bureau will be of great value to those who have friends in the navy. From a long knowledge of his merit we can recommend Mr. Osbon to the public.

The New Magnesium Light.—The great difficulty which has hitherto stood in the way of the utilization of this wonderful light has been the want of some means for its easy application. This difficulty now appears to be entirely surmounted. Mr. A. G. Grant, an American gentleman, resident at Nottingham, has patented an apparatus which effects in the simplest manner the object in view. The wire is coiled on spools and thence is drawn between cylinders to a tube through which it is thrust at precisely the rate at which it burns. Nothing can be more simple and effectual. The apparatus will form either a hand lamp or may be applied for other purposes, such as the lighting of theatres, the making of fog signals, or signals of any kind. The hand lamp will be especially useful to photographers. By its assistance, they will be able to take portraits in less time at night by the magnesium light than they can now in the daytime by the sun. There is a variety of other purposes for which the light will be useful now that it can be readily applied. The increasing cheapness of the magnesium wire will soon cause it to be generally adopted in all cases where a most brilliant light is required, and the lamp invented by Mr. Grant will materially assist in its advancement in public favor.

Singular Phenomenon.—At the foot of the first summit of the grand old Sierras, at a point just south of the Amador and Sierra Nevada wagon road, quietly nestles one of the most beautiful sheets of pure crystal water to be found in all California. Surrounded with snowclad giant hills, resting in a bed seemingly hewn out of solid granite, gives it a picturesque appearance; in fact, its situation is lovely and romantic in the extreme. Mountain trout are found here in abundance, and at this season of the year in no spot on the Pacific coast can the pleasure-seeker realise more enjoyment than at Silver Lake. But hold; we started out to tell about a strange phenomenon frequently occurring at that point. On a calm morning, about ten o'clock, a singular noise in the air is often heard passing over the lake. At times, the sound resembles that produced by the rapid flight of ducks, as they seemingly descend; at other times, like the ringing of a bar of iron passing swiftly through space; and then again, like the crackling noise made by the sudden bending of sheet iron. Now the sound comes from the east, going west; then from the north, going south. It apparently comes from some of the lofty mountain peaks surrounding the lake, and loses itself on some other on the opposite side. The sound produced is a strange, awe-inspiring sound, and it is said the Indians avoid the lake as haunted.

CHIEF-JUSTICE TANEY.

Roger Brooke Taney, Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, died in Washington on Wednesday evening, Oct. 12, after an illness of a few days.

Descended from a family of English Roman Catholics, which settled in Maryland about the middle of the 17th century, he was born in Calvert county, Md., March 17, 1777, and was consequently in his 88th year at the time of his death. He was graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1795, admitted in 1799 to the bar of his native county, from which he was elected a delegate to the General Assembly, and in 1801 removed his place of residence to Frederick. In 1823 he removed to Baltimore, having previously served as Senator in the Legislature of the State during a term of four years. He was appointed Attorney-General of Maryland in 1827, and in 1831 was appointed Attorney-General of the United States by President Jackson.

During the contest of the Administration with the Bank of the United States, upon the dismissal of Mr. Duane from the office of Secretary of the Treasury, Sept. 23, 1833, on account of his refusal to remove the deposits, Mr. Taney was appointed his successor, and immediately ordered the transfer of the deposits to the local banks selected by him as the agents of the Government. The Senate refused to confirm the nomination by a vote of 28 to 18, in June, 1834. In the following year he was nominated by President Jackson so on Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, but he was virtually rejected by the Senate, which indefinitely postponed the consideration of the subject on the last day of the term.

Upon the death of Chief-Justice Marshall, he was appointed his successor by President Jackson, and was confirmed by the Senate in March, 1836, that body having changed its political relations. He took his seat upon the Supreme bench in January, 1837, and held the office until the time of his death.

Chief-Justice Taney drew on himself severe censure by the unpopular but really historically true statement in his decision in the Dred Scott case, that "negroes, whether slaves or free, were regarded for a long time previous to the Declaration of Independence as beings of an inferior order, with no rights which the white man was bound to respect," and therefore were not included among the "people" in the terms of that instrument, and had no claims to be regarded as citizens of the United States.

Chief Justice Taney was never robust, and for many years was apparently so feeble that his death was looked for at any moment. Still, President has succeeded President, and he died at last almost at the close of the Administration of the 10th Chief Magistrate who had occupied the chair of Washington while he presided over the Supreme Court.

LOYAL DUNKARDS GOING NORTH.

Our Artist represents a scene at Harrisonburg, at the headquarters of Gen. Crook, on the 2d of October.

The fortunes of war have made the fertile valley of the Shenandoah, like Belgium and Lombardy, a favorite place for operations. Armies swept backward and forward, leaving terrible traces of their passage, but now the terrible fad has gone forth—it is to be desolated. Northward and Southward, as fair recollections dazzled, the rural population mustnow go. Among these who set their faces Northward were a number of Quakers, a sect of quiet non-combatants, resembling the Quakers, and one of the religious communities in which Pennsylvania has been so distinct. Capt. Cartwright, the Provost-Marshal, on the right, is handing them passes, and Capt. Douglas, the Commissary of Subsistence, is giving the home-traveling Dunkards information as to the means of reaching friends, while Maj. Stephens, Inspector-General of Gen. Crook's corps, is looking on. The number of loyal men is great. About 100 families came North with one supply train, and more are coming, abandoning their fine homes and fertile fields to the desolating hand of war. In the distance, on the left, is Sheridan's headquarters, with the headquarter designation, a red and blue light, and to the right the temporary prison for captured rebels.

SHERIDAN'S CAMPAIGN.

Woodstock—Destruction of Barns, &c.

The Shenandoah valley has always been a source of difficulty to our commanders. Its fertility rendered it a granary of almost inexhaustible resources to the Northern rebel armies, while its position made it a path, and the only safe path, for carrying the war into the Northern States. Lieut.-Gen. Grant studied the problems, formed his plan and selected his man. Early was just flush from the destruction of Chambersburg and a successful raid to the very streets of Washington, when Sheridan appeared in the valley. Evidently expecting to play the old game so often resorted to by the rebel commanders, Early undertook his antagonist, but thoroughly beaten at Winchester, rested at Fisher's hill, he was seat whirling out of the valley, and Sheridan actually reached Staunton and Waynesboro' with his advance, completely shattering and demoralizing Early's army.

The defeat of the rebel forces accomplished, the next step was to make the valley impracticable for their future operations.

"No doubt," says a correspondent, "the rebel papers will cry out against what is now being done in the valley towards rendering it unfit to nourish the rebel army. Yet it is only since we have commenced this work that we fairly see how necessary it is. Many of the mills we found in operation were grinding up as fast as wheat, which the millers were grinding up as fast as they could for the use of the rebel army. The amount of wheat which we find in the valley is astonishingly large. The mills are full of it. Stacks as high as houses are found in the fields. Besides, there is an abundance of oats in the stack and enormous quantities of corn. Almost every barn we come to is loaded with wheat, hay and oats. The destroying of these barns is being accomplished as fast as possible. Of course it is not pleasing sight to witness fires in every direction that the eye can penetrate. Still, it is pre-eminently necessary, and beyond all doubt a very great step towards putting down the rebellion. Unfortunately some few houses caught fire from the barns, and were consumed; but it was not our fault that this happened, nor was it our desire or intention that it should be so. In every instance that has come to the knowledge of your correspondent the greatest care has been taken to spare dwelling-houses, which are looked upon as strictly private property. The barns are not now looked upon in that light. They contain the means of subsistence for the rebel army, and that subsistence has been declared 'contraband of war,' and the barns must be destroyed because of their containing it."

Sheridan, in his dispatch from Woodstock, Oct. 7, his arrival in which we show in our illustration, says: "In moving back to this point the whole country from the Blue Ridge to the North mountain has been rendered untenable for a rebel army.

"I have destroyed over 2,000 barns filled with wheat and hay and farm implements, over 70 mills filled with flour and wheat, have driven in front of the army over four herd of stock, and have killed and issued to the troops not less than 3,000 sheep.

"This destruction embraces the Lurray valley and Little Fort valley, as well as the main valley."

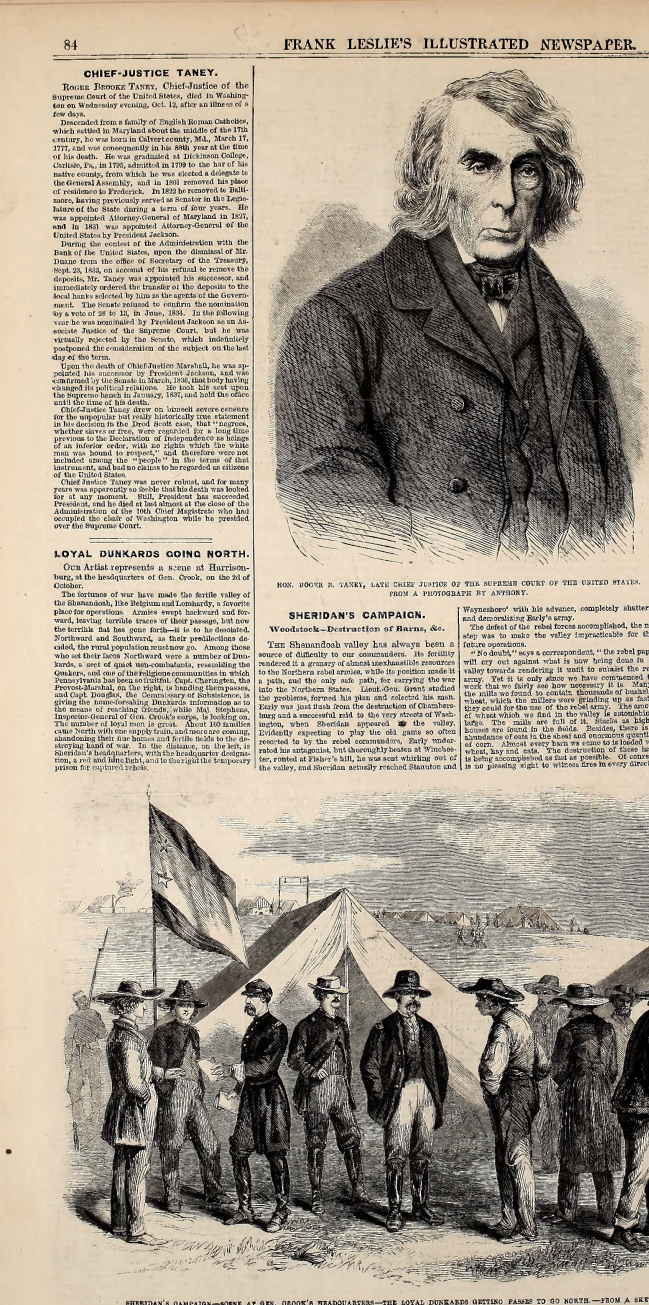
Defeat of Rosser.

As Sheridan retired the rebels pitched up a little courage, and Rosser, who was styled "the saviour of the valley," one of the very best cavalry officers in their armies, followed close on Sheridan's rear.

On the 8th of Oct., when moving to Strasburg Sheridan perceived the movement, and halted to give battle, but, finding that, to use his own words, "it was only all the rebel cavalry of the valley, commanded by Rosser," he directed Torbert to attack at daylight this morning and crush this saviour of the valley.

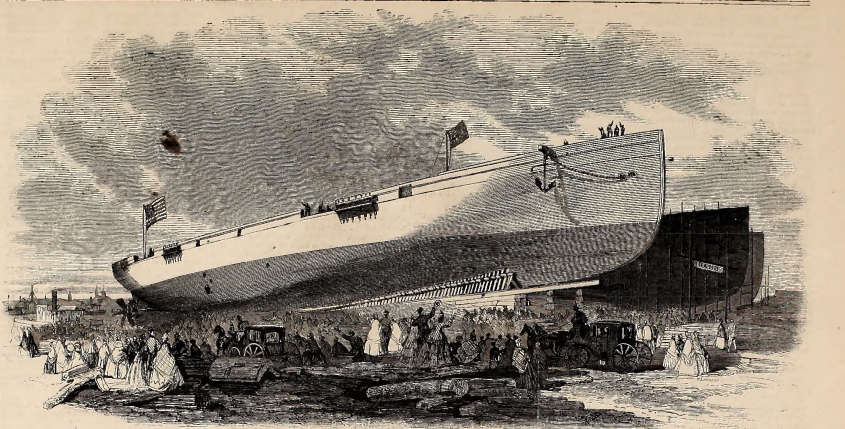
The attack was handsomely made. Custer, commanding the 3d cavalry division, charged on the back road, and Merritt, commanding the 1st cavalry division, on the Strasburg pike. Merritt captured five pieces of artillery, 400 caissons, forage, &c. The two divisions captured 43 wagons, ambulances, &c., among the wagons captured are the headquarters wagons of Rosser, Lomax, Wickham and Col. Pollard. The number of prisoners will be about 300.

The army, after being charged by our gallant cavalry, were broken, and ran. They were followed by our men, on the jump, 23 miles through Mount Jackson and across the North Fork of the Shenandoah. He deemed it best to make the delay of one day here, and settle his new cavalry General.



The 19 pieces of artillery captured to-day make 36 pieces captured in the Shenandoah valley since the 19th September. Some of the artillery was new, and had never been fired. The pieces were marked "Tredeger Works."

Our sketch of the army passing Woodstock shows that town, with its quaint-brick Court-house; but the view of Mount Jackson, which was for the rebels a vast hospital, the buildings in the sketch having been erected for the use of the sick and wounded, shows Rosser's last and successful effort to save one at least of the splendid array of guns with which he went forth to assail Sheridan's rear.



The struggle was a fierce one. Our men eager in pursuit, but the rebels looking but desperate, and shunting every nerve to save themselves from total disgrace, and ready to die to the last, to be able to carry off at least one gun.

Sponges.—The sponge business has become a permanent element of industry in the Bahama islands. It is almost entirely the growth of the last 20 years, and nets annually about $70,000. The sponge is found and raked from the sandy bottom of the ocean at the depth of 30, 40 or 60 feet. It belongs to a very low order of animals, the organization hardly being detected. When first taken from the water it is black, and becomes exceedingly offensive from decomposition. It is so poisonous in this condition that it almost blisters the flesh it happens to touch. The first process is to bury it in the sand, where it remains for two or three weeks, in which time the gelatinous animal matter is absorbed and destroyed by the insects that swarm in the sand. After being cleansed it is compressed and packed in bales like cotton. The sponge has been applied to a variety of new purposes, and within the past few years has quadrupled in value.

ACROSS THE WAY.

BY ETTA W. PIERCE.

Slanting and hot from the city roofs,
The sunlight falls like a bloody stain
On the shutter there, and the floor below,
And my nasty lodgers, all in a row,
And that gray spider weaving his web
Across the window pane.

I can look through her casement where I sit
In this dim old place, and see the room
With her books and chair, and the bird that swings
In his gilded cage, and flutters and sings
At the sight of her face; and her rose-tree there
Is purpling over with bloom.

Sometimes she leans o'er the low, wide sill;
The silken knot of her splendid hair
Shining like gold, and her two clear eyes,
Blue as harebells, and wondrous wise,
Half-raised to the rifts of twilight sky,
Like a vestal nun at prayer.

Sometimes the lattice vine is stirred
To the lightsome tune of her sweet old lays;
And I marvel to know there is not a sound
In the blue above or the air around,
So dear as that voice has grown to my heart,
In these long sunny days.

Oh, I thought, as a breath of wind came in
Through the shutter there a moment ago,
Of an old lost love with the same fair face—
The yellow tresses, the girlish grace,
And the eyes like violets laughing out
From a drift of April snow.

And that wind had a scent of wide, green fields,
Where the brown, brown swallows need to fly,
And a sound, I thought, like the springing of grain,
And some how, I wished I was young again,
And the few gray streaks were out of my hair—
The lost youth in my eye.

Oh, dainty Madge! oh, beautiful Madge!
Here's a sigh for the day that is dead and gone!
I remember you still as you used to stand
With the laurels loose in your slender hand,
Waiting for me with back-blown curls
In the path among the corn.

And the old dead kisses you kissed me there,
Some of their sweetness, I think, must cling
To the warm wind yet; and the pines that heard
Our old love-songs—oh, they still are stirred
By the ghosts of their echoes under the stars
In the long, blue nights of spring.

It was long ago, but the last embrace,
And the last fond tears, where you and I
Stood, hearing the hum of the yellow bees
Beneath the bloom of the orchard trees,
And the braided threads of the meadow brooks
With still feet creeping by.

Well, let it go! You were false—I cold,
And the sting of that sad, old, passionate pain
Is over; and yet, I would that I,
Lying to-day 'neath the self-same sky,
Could hear the wind in the corn, and dream
The dreams of that time again.

With a silky shining of yellow hair
Sweeping my breast—not the curls of old—
Lady Madge, you are watching to-day
Your girls and boys in their careless play,
And the old love lies in a deep, deep grave,
With not a spark in its mould.

But that little girl at the casement there,
With the nun-like face, so wistful and sweet,
Does she know how my life, to its very core,
Has leaped into summer-bloom once more?
Will she look at me kindly with her large eyes,
If I lay my heart at her feet?

COING TO THE ARBOR.

MY VACATION.

BY EDITH MAY.

The last exercise was closed. The last oration delivered. The final amen of the third long prayer spoken. The gray-haired minister raised his hands in benediction, and as his tremulous voice repeated: "May the peace which passeth all understanding rest and abide with you evermore," a calm, holy quiet stole into my heart, as if some master hand had swept across the clanging, vibrating chords, bringing strains of harmony out of the discord that had reigned there so long.

My cheeks were still flushed; my temples throbbing with the excitement and fatigue of the day. As I rose to leave the building my limbs refused to support me, and tottering feebly a few steps I sank helpless upon a seat. I was too weak to call for assistance, so I remained unnoticed and unheard for, until Minnie Carleton—my favorite little scholar, in searching for me to receive a parting kiss—found me fainting upon the hard seat.

A cool refreshing breeze called me to consciousness. I opened my eyes to find myself by an open window—Doctor Eastbrooke, Minnie, and a stranger gentleman whose dark eyes and intellectual countenance had attracted my attention during the afternoon, standing near, besides a number of frightened schoolgirls in the background of the circle.

"You are better," said Doctor Eastbrooke, kindly; "only a little excitement and over-exertion. You need a vacation in the fresh country air."

"Yes!" I answered, bitterly, "the prescription is pleasant but unattainable for me. I thank you for your kindness. I am quite well now."

But when I endeavored to walk I gladly accepted the stranger's proffered arm and suffered him to lead me from the building.

"There is not a carriage in sight. Do you think you can walk to your boarding-house with my assistance?" he asked.

"The distance is short—I can walk."

I might have added—I am accustomed to walking, and without assistance. Oh, how often in the past year I had wished for some arm to shield me from the rude storms of the world, some arm on which I could lean for support in hours of sorrow and weakness! and now, as my thoughts rose so vividly before me, I clung tenaciously to the strong; merely arm on which my hand rested, forgetful that I was appropriating to myself what a stranger had offered as an act of courtesy. Alarmed at my imprudence, I glanced hastily up to meet my companion's eyes bent upon me—not in contempt at my unwonted act, but in kind inquiry for the cause. We had reached the narrow, dusty street in which my boarding-house was situated: one glance at the tall, contracted house looming up before us brought me back to my life immediately. "The kind stranger only waited to see me enter, and disappeared.

That night my sad, lonely life seemed doubly cheerless. Since my father's death, when I found myself obliged to toil for my daily bread—I, who had never known a want which a father's love could supply—through that first year I had toiled patiently, even hopefully; but this day a simple act of kindness from a stranger had stolen upon my clouded pathway like a sunbeam, leaving the gloom more unbearable by the contrast. How those weary months of toil rose before me that night. The past day had not realized my expectations, for though it brought me a temporary release from my school cares and responsibilities, bitter thoughts and memories had mingled with the joy.

Three years ago that day, I, Margaret Vinton, the expected heiress of great worldly possessions, had graduated from Madame Stewart's Seminary. Then a timid schoolgirl, surrounded by friends and admirers, caressed by a loving father—this day an humble governess in the school where I had been the favorite scholar—despised and slighted by those who had been most profuse in their protestations of friendship! I grew bitter as I thought. In my bitterness I nearly doubted the justice and mercy of an overruling Providence. Why should my life be one of toil and privation, while those who once called themselves my friends were surrounded by every blessing and pleasure? I forgot I had once been as happy and thoughtless as they.

The next morning I was sitting in my room when a servant announced that a lady wished to see me. Visitors were a rare occurrence in my humble life, but supposing it to be one of my scholars, I smoothed my hair and descended to the parlor. As I entered the apartment Minnie Carleton sprang joyfully forward and presented me to her aunt, a tall, haughty lady whom I had met occasionally in better days, and who was now most unrelenting in her efforts to teach me the difference between my former position and that which I now occupied. She announced her errand at once.

"I have called, Miss Vinton, she said, "to secure your services, if possible, for the summer. I intend visiting the various places of resort with my family, and have been somewhat puzzled as to what disposition to make of Minnie, who is at present in my charge. She has boarded with my daughter in the family of a worthy farmer at Academy since the two vacations since her mother's death; but as my daughter is now old enough to accompany me, I have decided to propose that you should take charge of her until the commencement of school, boarding with her at Meadow Farm."

I did not answer, and she continued with remarkable consideration:

"And judging from your appearance, Miss Vinton, a few months in the country would prove beneficial to your health."

Thoughts crossed with such rapidity through my mind I was nearly bewildered. What happiness! to spend a whole vacation out of the dust and heat of the city! and only last night I had murmured, complaining that my life was without joy. Surely I could not deserve this good fortune!

"Do say yes, Miss Margaret. You don't know what a pretty place it is, and we shall have splendid times if you will only go," said Minnie.

"I will accept your proposal," I managed to say to Mrs. Adams.

"Very well, your salary will be paid in any way you may wish. Can you be ready to leave by the day after to-morrow?"

"I can."

"Good morning. Minnie will call for you at nine o'clock Friday morning," and with a highly gratified air the lady sailed out of the apartment.

She was gone, and my heart leaped with joy at the prospect. The day passed like a dream, yet when evening approached my preparations were nearly completed. My stranger friend called that morning, inquired concerning my health, and left a bouquet of wild flowers. On the card attached I read:

"Country flowers are attainable, if the air is not!"

Their delicate perfume filled my little room, bringing peace and quiet into my heart. That night I slept sweetly.

My first week at Meadow Farm; how like a delicious dream those days passed away! When the carriage which came for me on Friday morning, to my surprise I found my stranger friend to be one of the occupants. Minnie solved the mystery in her prettily childish way.

"This is my brother Paul, Miss Margaret, he is going to take us to Meadow Farm, and, perhaps, he will stay a week with us. Don't you hope he will?"

Mr. Carleton smiled at my embarrassment, and bending his dark eyes upon me, answered mischievously:

"Miss Margaret's acquaintance with your brother is too limited to make his presence very desirable; but I hope the time is not distant when it will be as acceptable to her as to you."

I did not reply, and at the moment we reached the wharf. As the boat loosed from her moorings sailed slowly out into the stream, I felt that many dire burdens me to a life of sorrow and toil were severed, for a time at least. Happy and free, my heart beat responsive to the scene surrounding me.

The day was lovely, and when we reached the "landing," from which A—— was accessible, the departing sun was painting sky and hilltop with gold and crimson splendors. As we jogged along in farmer Blake's capacious wagon, my eyes feasted upon the fresh beauty of the landscape. Groves of tall waving trees; orchards laden with the white drapery of apple blossoms, with an occasional bank of the pink peachblows interspersed; softly rippling brooks wanding like silver threads through the emerald carpeted meadows—

"Making themselves green banks along the while."

Hills covered over with flocks, and fields in living green. Good God, how can we be so dead to, and gave me a true motherly welcome. The farmhouse was a rambling old building, with gables and dormer windows, and a broad piazza in front, where swallows built their nests beneath the overhanging eaves, and lambs and sheep upon the green hill which rose in the background.

But of all the pleasant things I had seen my own room pleased me most. It seemed a desert of space compared to the few feet allotted me in the city. The floor was unexpected, the smooth surface scrubbed to a cleanliness truly refreshing. A four-posted bedstead hung with vallance, a blue-and-white covered toilet-stand, snowy pillows, cherry-framed mirror, low rocking-chair and fresh white curtains, were its principal adornments. After exchanging my travelling dress for a cool muslin, and brushing the heavy braids from my heated brow, I seated myself by the open window; a most delightful and ancient prayer for the asylum which had opened to receive me in the hour of need. Minnie came in from a visit to the barn and its inhabitants, her cheeks glowing with exhilaration.

"Oh, Miss Margaret! there are two of the cunningest little kittens in the barn, and two chickens, and the dearest little colt you ever saw; only so high," and she stretched her hands over her curly head.

I kissed the silken hair into ringlets, lingering lovingly over such as I knew a mother's hand had once reared, looped the short sleeves of her white dress with white ribbons. Minnie, who wore the garb of mourning, missing a mother's hand to robe that dimpled form. Fatherless and motherless, and the only child of Mr. Carleton, from harm, and warn from temptation—was she not to be pitied?

Sabbath morning we rode to the village church, and listened to words of admonition and entreaty from a simple-hearted disciple of Christ, spoken without affectation, yet in their earnestness and simplicity eloquent. Again those blessed words of benediction fell upon my ear, and with the "peace" resting in my heart, I left the sanctuary, and walked slowly towards the path which wandering through woods and fields led to Meadow Farm. I was in no mood to ride, and the others gladly yielded to my preference for the dusty road. I had not expected company, but Mr. Carleton was soon beside me. Few words were exchanged during the walk; I think each was deeply impressed by the silent yet fervent worship Nature offered to her God.

For a month Mr. Carleton lingered at Meadow Farm. Riding, walking and sailing with us, or reading—rendering the thoughts of poets and scholars more touching and beautiful by the magic of his voice. Evenings we gathered around in the little parlor, and with the melodeon as an accompaniment, sang old ballads which Mr. and Mrs. Blake had sung in their youth, and loved still. There was something very touching in the devotion of this worthy couple. The frosts of sixty winters had whitened their locks, and when Farmer Blake's step was firm, his form unbent—while Mrs. Blake's cheek vied the damask roses in her garden, and her voice was as clear and sweet as when it rose from the choir in the village church, in the days of her girlhood. Often on those quiet evenings her blue eyes liquid with tears—her hand clasped in that of her husband, she would sing—

"Now we maun totter down, John, but hand in hand
And we'll sleep thegither at the foot, John Anderson, my Jo."

The morning on which Mr. Carleton left Meadow Farm, Minnie and I accompanied him to the landing. Minnie had tried very bravely to keep back the tears ready to flow, but at the moment of parting drew near her courage failed, and clinging to him she sobbed convulsively.

"Oh, Paul! don't leave me!" she cried, clinging to him.

He drew her to his knee, soothing her with all a brother's tenderness. Then calling me he assisted me into the carriage, placing Minnie beside me.

"Remember, Minnie, I shall return in a few weeks, and then I expect to find you improved beyond recognition. Will you trust me, little sister?"

"Yes, I will," she sobbed; "only you must write very often and come back very soon," and she was led over for another kiss.

"Miss Margaret, I leave you a very precious charge," he said, looking me full in the face, which I would rather you had no one else. Remember, she is fatherless and motherless. I know you can sympathise with her."

In a moment more he was gone, and we were riding back to the farm. After that the days passed more slowly, interrupted frequently by letters from Mr. Carleton, of which Minnie was the proud. They were long, loving epistles, containing many kind messages to me. In one he wrote that he had purchased Willow Glen, my old home, of which my father had been so proud; there were descriptions of many well-known haunts, bringing a tide of memories which I had thought long since buried beyond resurrection.

One lovely day in the early autumn brought an invitation in the form of Mrs. Adams and her two haughty daughters, "coming," as Mrs. Adams expressed it, "for a few day's rest in these unobtrusive visits." Minnie was forcibly taken from me in these following days, petted and caressed by her cousins, very much to her annoyance, and only resumed from open rebellion by my lectures and entreaties. Each day she came to me for sympathy, often with flashing eyes and quivering lip.

"Miss Margaret," she said, one day, "that hateful Laura says I am a little artful, designing creature; and that all you came here for was to get Paul to marry you."

All my former pride was aroused by this cruel insinuation, and forgetful of all but my wounded pride, I exclaimed, springing to my feet:

"Has Miss Laura dared to make such an assertion? She judges by a fearfully low standard when she compares my actions to her own."

"Oh, Miss Margaret, Miss Margaret! And I told her so too. Then she asked me if I would like to have her for a sister, and live with her and Paul at Willow Glen. I told her I would not live at the Glen if she was going to be there."

I was too much excited to consider how wrong it was to allow Minnie to continue. Miss Adams's unjust interpretation of my actions roused me to a perfect fury. The room seemed fearfully small, the air stifling. Seizing my hat, I went out into the shady grove at the back of the house. As I passed through the hall Miss Laura's open door warned me that I had been overheard. There in an refreshing state of dishabille, my self-complacency and vanity received a severe shock. Her pulses throbbed less wildly, and the burning left my cheek. Minnie also grew more calm, but she still sobbed over the hurt to her mother's memory her brother's love from her.

"If Laura goes to live at the Glen, I shall not; I will stay with you always, Miss Margaret," she said, between her sobs.

"Hush, Minnie; it is not right for you to say so. Besides, you may do her injustice. If, after a while, you find her kind and good, you would love her very dearly," I replied, soothingly.

Minnie had grown very dear to me in those past few months, and the thought of separation was doubly painful when I reflected how very few objects of love were left to me; but however painful the task, I determined to have Meadow Farm the next day. The commencement of school was near at hand, and a few weeks in the city would be fully sufficient for the satisfaction I should have of knowing that Miss Laura's charitable scheme of exposing me to Mr. Carleson's ridicule, when he should arrive, would be frustrated.

The sun was setting when we turned our steps homeward. As we left, the grove a gentleman advanced from the farmyard. Minnie caught but a few glimpses of him as the strong twilight fell to meet her brother. She could scarcely wait to receive his kiss before she asked the question which had caused her such unhappiness.

"Paul, is cousin Laura going to live with you at Willow Glen?"

"And what if she is, Minnie?" he asked, smiling.

"Because if she is going there, there will be no place for me," she answered, her blue eyes brimming with tears.

"Rest assured, little sister, that there will always be room in your brother's house and heart for you."

"But you have not answered my question," Minnie persisted.

"I will tell you to-morrow, Minnie, who is to live with us at Willow Glen," and with that she was obliged to be satisfied.

I noticed that the entire absence of Miss Laura's keen eyes as she teased Minnie about the romantic reception she had given her brother, but her shots fell harmless, and the second flung he removed from her power to torment me. Poverty and toil were light compared with the exquisite torture Miss Laura was constantly inflicting upon me.

That night was clear and beautiful. Far as eye could reach the landscape lay bathed in a flood of silvery moonlight, Minnie was sleeping in her little bed, and Laura and her mother were playing a duet on the piano, while I leaned upon the open window, gazing dreamily through the fleecy clouds, catching now and then the flutter of a white dress and a flash of bright jewels from the walk below, as the ladies and gentlemen (for the house had been filled with company all day) passed my window. Suddenly the tone of Laura's voice rang like a death-knell in my ears, calling forth intense hatred for the one who could not leave me one fond cherished hold so much. How long I sat there I know not. I was aroused from a reverie of the past by a flower thrown skilfully from the ground below hitting my cheek. I looked down in astonishment, and saw Mr. Carleton smiling at my perplexity.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Margaret, for my peremptory call, but I had called you several times, and in despair resorted to this means of calling you back to earth. Will you come down and walk with me?"

I declined, haughtily.

It is important that I should speak with you to-night. Will you not grant me the interview?"

My first impulse was to decline, but a view of my trunk already packed reminded me it would be for the last time, and I descended to the porch where Mr. Carleton awaited me.

"Come this way, they have company and will call you in if they see you," he said in a low tone, and conducted me to the grape arbor.

The heavy dews were falling, and as we entered the arbor my companion folded my shawl closely around me, and laid my handkerchief over my head, at which I was sorely tempted to tell him that I could take care of myself, this does seem like a most unnatural world. He waited for me to speak, and thinking it best to end the interview as soon as possible, I asked:

"Has Miss Adams told you that I resign my charge and return to the city to-morrow?"

"You have not told me how you have enjoyed your vacation?" he replied, not noticing my remark.

"It has passed very pleasantly."

"You are not as interested in my behalf as I am in yours, Margaret, for you have not made a single inquiry, and I was absent so much longer than we expected," he said, reproachfully.

"You forget I have been informed of your movements during the summer."

"Pray who could have informed you of all my movements?" he asked rather satirically.

"Do you not remember that Miss Adams is at Meadow Farm?"

"Have you no question to ask me about Willow Glen?"

"No; it is nothing to me now," I replied, sadly.

"Will you not make it something to you, Margaret?" I long so much to see you once more unaware of your old home!"

"Do not presume upon my loneliness, Mr. Carleton!" I exclaimed passionately, withdrawing my hand from his arm.

"What can you mean, Margaret? Do you think I would play with your feelings if I were not in earnest? I have loved you for a long time. Will you not come back to your old home, and make it a happy home for me and Minnie?" and his full deep tones grew tremulous with emotion.

I could not answer, and deeming my silence consent, he folded me in his strong, manly arms, and drew my head tenderly to his shoulder.

"My own Margaret, my pearl!" he murmured, pressing a kiss upon my brow.

This happiness, so sudden, so unexpected, held me speechless. I saw through the vista of the arbor a shower of rose stems and winds, one long delightful vacation. Then the vexations of the past week came back to me, and womanlike I could not be happy while there was a mystery still unexplained. Impulsively I drew back, and raising my eyes searchingly, said:

"Laura Adams?"

He comprehended immediately, and bending his truthful eyes full upon me, he answered:

"Is nothing to me, and you are everything! Are you satisfied, Margaret?" he asked, smiling.

"Yes."

When I went to the breakfast-table the next morning I found Mrs. Adams and Laura there and her daughters were profuse in their expressions of regret for my departure. Minnie was inconsolable, and my position of the subject bringing tears to her eyes.

"Minnie will need some one to take care of her after Miss Vinton's departure, Paul. Had you not better procure a governess to fill her place?" asked Mrs. Adams, playfully.

"Be assured my dear aunt I appreciate your kindness, as also your anxiety on Minnie's behalf for the office; but it will not be necessary, for though Miss Vinton has decided to resign her position of governess she will be Minnie's sister, I have promised her to continue her duties under different circumstances."

An awful silence followed this announcement. Mrs. Adams, too proud to ask an explanation in words, replied only by a cool bow.

"That Margaret will be your sister!" asked Minnie, pushing back her chair and going to his side.

His arm was around her in a moment.

"That Margaret will be your sister!" he said firmly.

"And that with us instead of Laura? Oh, I am so glad!" she said, forgetful of her cousin's presence. "But, Paul, is she going away from us here?"

"No; we will go to the city with her this morning, and in one month we shall all be together at Willow Glen."

"I am so glad!" and coming to me, she kissed me fondly, calling me by her sister.

I had thought very little of the time when I should enter upon my new duties, and Mr. Carleton's proposition to me under my former relation I had bestled so long alone, that I was quite willing to leave all manœuvring to one who I knew would accept my happiness and welfare.

The four weeks passed quickly. The time was short, but my preparations were simple, and at the appointed time I was ready. Mrs. Adams refused me the slur. As I heard again those blessed words of benediction, the last lingering echo of discord went out of my heart, and with those sweet prayers words "my wife" fell upon my ear the Angel of Peace entered my heart, and amassing its crystal doors, dwelt and abided there ever since.

The days pass quickly and happily now. Willow Glen is my home again, and with the love of my darling little sister, and the devotion of my noble husband, I cease to sigh for the past days of my girlhood, and thank God for the discipline through which I have passed, looking forward with the future as a delightful never-ending vacation.

ANTIQUITY OF MAN—INTERESTING DISCOVERIES.—Among all the many papers presented by members of Sciences, Paris, on this interesting subject, there is none of greater importance than that of the question which was presented by MM. Lalet and Christy, confirming the fact that the human race is of greater antiquity than the chronicles of the Bible. The above gentlemen having, during the latter part of 1863, visited the district in the department of the Dordogne, explored, among other caverns, that known as the Cave Eyzies, situated at the confluence of the Vezere with the small stream called the Beune. Here, under a thick layer of black earth, they found, at a depth of two feet, a concretion of broken bones and cinders, and among them a number of flint implements. So far there was nothing extraordinary, but on researching further they discovered under these remains the remains of the antlers of the reindeer, the most unequivocal evidence of the existence of that animal of all others inhabited France during the without reason, be fairly assigned to the quaternary or diluvian or drift period—that is long before the appearance of man. The explorers had previously ascertained that there was no sign of the soil having been moved at a later period than the deposit of the concretion of the reindeer were firmly imbedded in the breccia which rested on it. The implements found in this cave were some which testified a degree of civilization far beyond any that might have been suspected to exist at so remote a period—viz., needles made out of the sawdust of the reindeer's antlers, with eyes to receive the thread; marks of sharp instruments in the bones, showing that the sinews had been cut in order to make them into threads, a practice existing among Esquimaux to this day; and, lastly, sculptured antlers of no mean execution. Our authors especially describe one in which the artist has shown wonderful taste in adapting the form of an animal to the shape of a handle, forming a sheath of head of dagger, the blade of which is made out of an antler.

PLAY THE MAN.

Is there a star that does not shine?
Is there a flower without its scent
In all creation's span?
Perform thy part—the soul's divine;
Be then what heaven hath meant,
And play the man!

If new irradiations beam,
And overflow thy mounting soul,
Heed not the censor's ban:
Pour then abroad the lucid stream,
Wide as the billows roll,
And play the man!

'Tis mental hunger crowns the great,
And moral strength of thought and will,
To dare what valor can,
Whate'er may be thy mortal state,
The world is all up-hill,
Then play the man!

What soldier longs for peaceful fields?
What sailor sighs for placid seas,
Since war and waves began?
To courage, peril, victory yields,
Virtue fades in lapse of ease,
Then play the man!

Behold those wondrous orbs of fame,
That shine for ever. When they wrought
Their grand conception's plan,
Not agony, and want, and shame
Could dim their glorious thought.
Then play the man!

To be a man is not to shine
In raiment rich and gems of gold,
With pride's plume self to fan;
'Tis not to sport on seas of wine,
O'er rocks of ruin rolled;
Then play the man!

To be a man is God to fear,
To fly from Passion's painted breast,
Truth's angel-form to span,
The ship of right to boldly steer,
And ride o'er danger's crest.
Then play the man!

A ray from every little star
Illuminates the midnight sky,
And beautifies its span.
Each heart can love-beams shed afar,
And hush some spirit's sigh.
Then play the man!

WAIF.

BY J. R. WEBB.

CHAPTER I.

JOHN HURLEY was a plain, honest, unassuming young man of twenty-three, not handsome—in fact, barely passable according to the popular standard—but possessed of a heart bursting of kindness, generosity and affection. He was unobtrusive in manner, even diffident, the result of a modest nature and the careful training of his beloved widowed mother.

Mr. Hurley had died during John's infancy, leaving his relict a comfortable home and the guardianship of his only child—all that he had to give to her whom he loved dearer than life. And faithfully had she fulfilled her trust. The broken heartstrings in time were healed in the double affection felt for her boy, and all the resources of her kind, motherly nature were called into action in his development, readering him, at maturity, a model of goodness, virtue and affection.

It was Christmas morning—nearly a score of years ago—and John had risen early to surprise his mother with a "Happy Christmas" and the presentation of an elegant shawl which he had carefully selected for her on the preceding day.

"Thank you, my dear boy," said his mother. "It is a beautiful present, and I shall prize it doubly as a gift from you. But, really, John, you are more considerate than myself, for I am almost ashamed to say that I have not yet procured a Christmas present for you."

"No matter, mother; I need no presents to prove your affection for me," he replied.

"And I might say the same with regard to you, John; nevertheless, you shall have a Christmas present. The weather will be pleasant after awhile, and I will go out to see what I can find."

Mrs. Hurley proceeded to prepare the breakfast, and opening the coffee-box, exclaimed, suddenly:

"What, John, the coffee is all gone! Not enough for breakfast, I declare! I don't see how I came to overlook it. I wish, dear, you would go around to the grocery and get some as quickly as possible, for I have the breakfast nearly ready."

"Certainly, mother," replied the son, hastily adding his hat and starting out.

He opened the hall door and was about to run down the steps, when suddenly he stopped, stared for a moment, and exclaimed to himself: "What the deuce is this?"

A large basket, apparently full of something! covered with a blanket, set upon the topmost step.

"It must have been left here by mistake," thought John, "or else somebody has left it here for a short time with the intention of taking it away again," and he was just about to remove it, when he espied a paper pinned to a corner of the blanket, on which something was inscribed in pencil. He stooped down and read:

"A Christmas present for John Hurley."

"Well, really, this is interesting," thought John, with a smile. "A Christmas present that occupies a hundred baskets! Who can it be from? I wonder if Black & Holland would open their gorestrings in the way of a present for my sticking so closely to Coke and Blackstone? I'm continued, meditatively. "But I will see what it is, at all events," and he picked up the basket, which was quite heavy, and returned to his mother.

"Why, John, what have you got there?" asked the good lady, in astonishment, as John placed the large basket upon the floor.

"A Christmas present, mother, that somebody has been kind enough to send me."

"But what is it?"

"That's just what I want to discover," replied the son, removing the blanket from the basket.

Births "present" was not yet visible. Another blanket was thrown off, then a heavy quilt, then a fine lambswool covering, and there, just opening its eyes from sleep, by a tiny, beautiful little baby!

"John!" There was a whole volume of meaning in that exclamation, as Mrs. Hurley threw up her hands in horror and gazed in a piercing glance upon her son. Doubt, inquiry, distrust, reproach were all blended in it.

"Mother!" It was all John said, yet the tone of wounded pride and affection was enough to satisfy his mother.

"Pardon me, John," said the good lady, taking her son's hand, "I am sorry that I doubted you for a moment; but I was so surprised that I hardly knew what I uttered."

John gave his mother an affectionate kiss, and proceeded to relate to her the particulars of his discovery.

The probabilities and even possibilities of the little Waif's history were fully discussed, but no satisfactory solution to the mystery was reached. They had heard of mothers getting rid of their offspring in that manner, but why was the little stranger left at their door? and why was John made the recipient of such a "present?"

"It's a pretty little thing," said John, looking admiringly at the babe.

"And not more than three or four days old, I am sure," returned his mother. "But what shall we do with it? Send it to the orphan asylum?" she continued.

John was meditating.

"Did you not hear me, John? I asked you if we shall send it to the asylum?"

"Oh, yes," he replied, abstractively, and then suddenly continued, in an animated tone, "mother, why cannot we keep the poor little Waif? You know we had nothing to do with compelled to endure it taken to an asylum, and somehow it seems to me that we ought to keep it?"

Mrs. Hurley was a kind, tender-hearted woman, always willing to assist the unfortunate, and without passionately fond of children; but she did not think favorably of John's proposition, as she ran the objections to it over in her mind. The scandal which it would naturally produce in connection with her son; the probable illegitimacy of the child; the trouble and expense of rearing an infant, were matters which received full weight in the good lady's mind.

But John had become interested in the homeless little Waif, and pleaded its cause with all the energy of an embryo lawyer. He did not fear scandal, he said. His family could bear high in the estimation of the virtuous and the good to be injured by such means. The child might be illegitimate, he admitted, but that was not its fault, and as for the trouble and annoyance, could they not employ a nurse to take care of his protege?

John triumphed, and the next morning's paper contained the important announcement that a respectable and handsome little boy, possessing lacteal qualifications, could find a good situation by applying immediately at 101 Blank street.

CHAPTER II.

JOHN HURLEY did not repent of having induced his mother to adopt the little Waif, his Christmas present. As the weeks passed, and it began to exhibit those interesting little developments of doubling its clubby little fists and smiling so sweetly—John thought he had never witnessed anything so beautiful—he felt more drawn to the larger and began to recognise him—holding out its little hands to him, and in baby-language asking him to take it—he felt quite a new interest in the young stranger. He would remain in the house for hours at a time playing with his present, very much to the delight of Mrs. Hurley, and equally much to the disgust of Black and Holland, who became alarmed at his sudden aversion to their dusty volumes.

"John," said Mrs. Hurley, one day, "we must really find a name for baby."

"I know it, mother; but we have already discussed the matter without coming to a conclusion. As you have said, if we had only to furnish a Christian name, it would be easy enough; but the surname—the family name—is the puzzle. I have decided to give her one name, for she is not a Hurley and is something else."

"True," replied the mother; "but she will soon be too large to call 'Waif' and 'baby.'"

A thought suddenly occurred to John.

"Why not call her 'Waif,' mother, and as she grows older, if her true name is not discovered, people will naturally give her our surname. Besides, I think it would be a pretty, pretty name—odd, to be sure, but I like odd names. What say you, mother?"

And from that day baby's name was Waif.

When Waif began to walk and talk the scene of John Hurley's happiness was reached, and his very life seemed bound up in the child. And it was not strange, for John had never mingled much in society, had never known the joy of such a treasure; and then Waif was so beautiful. How her large hazel eyes sparkled in play; and how cunning her little brown curls looked; and what dainty little feet she had; and what plump little hands. John thought there never was such a child—his own little Waif.

CHAPTER III.

MANY years had passed since John Hurley found his wonderful Christmas present upon the doorstep, and a corresponding change had occurred in the appearance of the little family group. Mrs. Hurley had become weak and infirm through age, and John gave evidence of the march of time in the furrows that appeared upon his face and the occasional gray hairs found upon his head; for John had passed his fortieth year, and was starting down the declivity of time, with no companion nearer to him than his mother and Waif.

And what of Waif?

She had grown into a woman of eighteen, very pretty, but world dreamed, but transcendently beautiful according to John Hurley's vocabulary. She was so graceful, so modest, so perfect in her manners, and withal so fond, so amiable and so good. If John loved the little prattler that sat upon his knee long ago, no wonder that his affection had increased and strengthened during the years that he had watched and guarded her with even more than parental jealousy. His very life seemed to be devoted to her happiness, the gratification of her every wish; and the nobleness of soul which characterised her at maturity amply recompensed John for all his efforts on her behalf.

It was not strange that Waif's beauty, purity and accomplishments caused a multitude of suitors to hover round her, and perhaps the prospect of a handsome dowry from Hurley's strong box had something to do with their coming. But however that was, they all received the same respectful, cordial attention, and the same coolest though emphatic refusal.

It was Christmas evening, and John and Waif sat together in the parlor awaiting the hour for the grand ball at Mrs. Ellinwood's, to which they had been invited. But little was said between them, for each seemed engaged with personal reflection. Waif looked very pretty in her ball costume, but there was an apparent listlessness in her manner and bearing which plainly that her mind was not wholly at ease.

"John," she said, suddenly, after a protracted silence.

"What is it, dear?" asked John, rousing from his reverie.

"Are you very anxious to go to the ball to-night? The fact is, I am broadly invited to all balls and parties and the young coxcombs by whom I am always besieged. I would rather stay at home, unless you desire to go," and a look of vexation overspread her pretty face.

"Indeed, Waif," replied John, "I am hastily and if duty you have no objection. I have very little taste for such places, to tell the truth, and have only gone to them for the sake of introducing you to society. But," he added, after a pause, "you do not seem so anxious to receive the acquaintance of this young Ellinwood, who has just returned from Europe. He seems to be a great favorite with the ladies, by the way. I watched his companion closely as he concluded.

"They are all alike to me," she replied, with some evidence of irritation or contemptuous.

"You seem to have a poor opinion of marriageable mankind," returned John, with a poor attempt to smile.

"No," she replied; "I do not make my remark so sweeping as that. But I cannot like the young, heartless coquettes whom I meet at balls and the like."

John mused. What did she mean by that remark? An aversion to young coquettes! and—but a thought struck him.

"I am afraid, Waif, that your remarks, that we shall have some difficulty in finding the lucky young fellow who will come up to your standard," and he watched her more closely.

A little foot patted the floor a moment, and she replied:

"If I should ever marry, my husband will be a man whose kindness, affection and purity of heart will be manifested in his life. I will not rank the happiness of my life by giving my hand to one whom I do not thoroughly know, or whose principles of life I do not approve."

Their eyes met, and the language of that mutual glance was expressive beyond the power of words.

"You do not mean that, Waif?" exclaimed John, eagerly, taking her hand in his own.

"Do you love me, and will you be my wife, darling?"

It was all John said—in fact, all that he could find words to say—and a very commonplace declaration of love it was. But the most eloquent speech and the most poetical utterance could not have been so dear to Waif as the homely language of him whom she had always loved with a fervor only equalled by John's love for her. She did not answer him in words, her soul was too full for speech, but John knew that she was his for life.

"Waif," said John, kissing her hand in his own, "Do you love me, and will you be my wife, darling?"

It was all John said—in fact, all that he could find words to say—and a very commonplace declaration of love it was. But the most eloquent speech and the most poetical utterance could not have been so dear to Waif as the homely language of him whom she had always loved with a fervor only equalled by John's love for her. "Waif," said John, kissing her hand in his own, "Do you love me, and will you be my wife, darling?"

"I do, John—you are my step-daughter, you know," replied Waif, archly.

A kiss followed the witty retort.

"And you care not for what busybodies may say?"

She looked at him, seriously, and replied:

"Did you think of such persons, John, when you found the little Waif on your door-step eighteen years ago to-day?"

"You are right, dear; and that remarks me that you have removed the Christmas present, and I am not now so much troubled to find a surname for you."

"If I only knew something definite respecting my parentage, I would not now have another wish to gratify," remarked Waif, thoughtfully.

And, in spite of her efforts to restrain it, a tear appeared upon her cheek, for she knew that the world required her parentage as unenviable, to say the least.

"Don't think of it, darling," returned John, affectionately. "Happy in each other's love, we will act well our part, satisfying our own consciences, and giving no heed to those who are low and so wish us evil."

CHAPTER IV.

IT was the evening of the day before the wedding. John Hurley and his affianced wife were sitting at a recessed parlor window in their own house, for the springtime had come, pleasantly conversing upon the great epoch of their lives, now so near at hand, when a splendid carriage stopped in front of the house, and a messenger entered with a note for Mr. Hurley. John opened it and read:

"Will Mr. Hurley and his affianced wife do me the favor to call and see me immediately? I trust he do not disappoint me. My carriage will convey you here, and return you home after the interview.

MARIA LIVINGSTON.

"Per ——."

John and Waif both knew the author of the note. She was an aged maiden lady, very rich, and residing only a few blocks distant, on ——— street. She had been bedridden for a long time, which, with growing petulishness and irritability of temper, had left her few personal friends.

Waif looked at her betrothed wonderingly as she concluded reading the letter, and said, inquiringly:

"We will go, of course?"

"Certainly," replied John, and a few minutes later they were at the bedside of the invalid Miss Livingston.

It was an elegantly furnished apartment, well in keeping with the resources of its occupant.

"I am glad you have come," said the invalid. And then motioning the attendant to retire, she continued:

"You are Mr. Hurley, I believe; and you," looking at Waif, "are the white-robed bride found upon the doorstep on a Christmas morning?"

They both nodded assent, and she continued, addressing Waif:

"And have you never learned anything respecting your parentage?"

"Nothing whatever," replied Waif, with a look of wonder.

"Then listen to me," continued the other. "I am sick and weak and you are to be married to-morrow. I am glad of it. This is a responsibility with me that I cannot live more than a few weeks at best, as my physicians tells me, has induced me to reveal to you long ago what I have long designed telling you. Do not interrupt me in the narration, for I am very weak, and must use as few words as possible.

"Your father," addressing Waif, "was my only brother. He was rich, and I lived with him and his wife. Four or five years before your birth your father died, and his wife, your mother, was so grief-stricken that she entirely refused company. Your birth and your mother's death occurred on the same night. Your father having made no will, you would, of course, have been the heir to all his property would have been held in trust for you, and I, who had no resources of my own, would have been turned into the streets a beggar. Nobody but the doctor and myself was acquainted with the birth of your birth, and a hint from him—the doctor—induced me to form a plan for getting you out of the way and placing you in possession of your father's property, being next heir-at-law. We then, if you remember, Mr. Hurley, lived nearly opposite your present home. Having the goodness to part with yourself and mother, I determined upon a plan of action, and you know the rest."

After a moment's rest she continued:

"The property, of course, came into my possession; and, I am happy to say, has greatly increased in value under my management. It rightfully belongs to you, and you shall have it. My lawyer tells me he is aware of all the circumstances, and that my claim can be established by my affidavit, &c., but there are many things that could not properly be conveyed to you in that manner. I have accepted the simpler method of making a will, leaving to you all the stocks, bonds, mortgages, real estate and deposited money, in my name. But this effort has exhausted my little strength," she continued, after a pause. "Come again, and I will tell you more of your parents. I have asked God to forgive me for the wrong I have done you, and perhaps you may forgive me when I have gone from the world."

Need I say that, out of the fulness of their joy, the lovers did not refuse the poor boon of forgiveness to the aged and dying penitent?

They had scarcely uttered a word to each and Waif. They live in that elegant mansion on ——— avenue where Miss Livingston resided, and I understand that John is now the wealthiest man in another little Waif, that very much resembles the one he found upon the doorstep many years ago.

DOCTORS AND PATIENTS.—Among the curious statistics brought to light in England upon the census returns here is one made by Dr. Farr. It is recorded that, for every death in a year, there are constantly two persons ill in the year, and, so reckoning, the census of 1851 and 1861 and the mortality returns of the intervening years give the following results: In all England and Wales 47 persons constantly sick to one medical man, including under this last term not only physicians and general practitioners, but also such assistants and medical students as are above 20 years of age. In London the proportion is only 34 resident sick to one doctor; in the south-eastern counties, 37; south-western 45; south-midland 49; west-midland 54; eastern 57; northern 58; north-midland 59; Yorkshire 64, Monmouthshire and Wales 76, and in the north-western counties (Lancashire and Cheshire) as many as 80. Those who are not in practice are medical men to every 1,071 persons in England and Wales.

ALBERT DURER.

There artists live within the clouds,
And shadow forth a purer
And fairer life than that of ours;
So lived old Albert Durer.

But lest old Albert should begin
To think his more than human,
God gave him, to subdue his pride,
A very angry woman.

And when he fashion'd angels' heads,
And painted eye and lip,
She vexed, of his too heavenly dreams
By this morcese Xantippe.

Within a little room upstairs
Worked Albert late and early;
Beneath he heard her supple tongue,
That ceased its rattle rarely.

For, like a kite, he sought the sky,
And soar'd on wing ecstatic,
Until she pulled the string and brought Him down to earth domestic.

And still within his placid face
You see the sad expression;
Poor Albert's story teaches us
A somewhat useful lesson.

For when I envy him his fame—
The color fame had nurst,
I look at Letty, and am glad That I'm not Albert Durer!

NINA MARSH;

OR,

THE SECRET OF THE MANOR.

CHAPTER XX.—THE TUG OF WAR.

COLONEL ST. GEORGE, when in town, occupied lodgings in Piccadilly. Nobody enjoyed life more heartily than the gallant colonel. As we have said, his constitution was naturally robust, his digestion unimpeachable. Dyspepsia, even in its mildest form, was a thing he had not nursed, much less realized. He could fare sumptuously every day, and experience no ill effects therefrom, waking after a night of moderate repose to the full enjoyment of his breakfast and morning paper.

Had Colonel St. George been fond of preaching, his text would have been moderation. But his choicest wit and that expressive kind which gives facts instead of fancies, frait instead of flowers. He might have expanded his text endlessly and made but the impression to be obtained by the mere display of his vigorous frame and healthy organization.

Master St. George sipped delicately at the cup of life, which to him contained nothing but nectar of the finest flavor. Conscience never poisoned the draught. He could follow his own devices without a twinge of warning or menace. Conscience had grown dead within him, and no longer condescended to speak a word to the hardened sinner who loved his sin.

The colonel was in excellent spirits this morning. Unlike his amiable relative, the Earl of Gillingham, he always felt fresh of a morning, and keenly alive to the pleasure of entering on a new day. The colonel was somewhat past now, in his usual tranquil, equable way, whether a wife would be so very inconvenient.

"Nina would certainly do credit to a man's taste," was his inward reflection; "she'd have all London mad after her in no time, and that would be pleasant enough, only we have no such trifles in some batteries. Is it gratifying to have a beautiful woman about one, but there are certain disadvantages in the bargain; she's sure to get crushed and screwed directly she gets up here, and has so many admirers swarming round her. But I suppose it will have to come to this," added the colonel, with a little sigh; "that is to say, if Mr. Goldsmith persevere in his suit, which it is devoutly to be hoped he may not do."

But at this moment Colonel St. George's reflections were suddenly ended, and the old adage signally verified by the appearance of Lord Gillingham.

"Ah! you're up, are you?" said the earl, astonished to find that his cousin could take the trouble to rise early without any special object in view. "I never expected to find you at home."

"I am never in bed at this hour, excepting at Rockleham, and there your lordship keeps it up late that the one is obliged to burn day into night to regain one's lost sleep."

"I thought you seemed to reconcile yourself to the change without difficulty," said the earl, with a sneer.

"No, my lord; excuse me; I never reconcile myself easily to such inconvenience. Any infringement of established laws disconcerts me. I am just as much of a martinet in private life as I used to be in service. Like a certain illustrious personage, and the strictest discipline kept up in every relation of life. I would even have my thoughts in training if I could."

"I think they would be obstinate at drill," said the earl, meaningly. "But I must say, for myself, that order is a despot I never quarrel with. I like punctuality and regularity and precision are the duties of machines, and not of human beings."

"But see how peaceably the machines work."

"Simply because they have no power to revolt. Once inclose a spirit within one of these complicated machines, and its struggles and weaknesses would soon disorder the working."

"My lord, you have turned philosopher, I see."

"Or rather sewper," answered the earl, with a deep, meaning smile.

"Of whom? if I may inquire."

"We are coming to that presently; to hurry events would not accord with your theories. In the meantime, perhaps you can tell me the date of Mrs. St. George's death."

There was the slightest possible start, but so slight that even the earl, though keenly on the watch, could not be sure of his effect. Then the colonel turned to his relative, a cool smile on his lips, a glance of thorough scorn in his eyes:

"It is strange how your lordship will persist in worrying me about the decease of Mrs. St. George. I have done all I could to satisfy all your doubts, too. You have had the certificate of her death in your possession for weeks now, and might have examined it every day had you felt so inclined. I have not stood in the way of any investigations society can expect to be pleasant. If you had felt any more doubts after this, you had only to go to Woodcraft. For half-a-crown you might have had a good view of the register from which her certificate was copied."

"I have just returned from Woodcraft," answered the earl, quietly.

There was no start this time, only a show of more steady attention and watchfulness, as if Colonel St. George began to understand that his law's meaning, and did not choose to be taken at any disadvantage.

"I hope you enjoyed your visit," said the colonel, crossing one his leg to imitate the perfect fit of his Parisian boot. "They tell me the air of Woodcraft is very dry and bracing; just the very thing for your lordship's complaint."

"I did not go there for my health," responded the earl. "I have never felt better in my life than I feel to-day."

"I thought your lordship looked jaded, too; but perhaps it was my mistake."

There was one thing the earl hated above all others, and that was to be told that he looked ill, especially by Colonel St. George, whom he would have had to believe that he was one of the most robust people on earth. In this case it was doubly annoying, since the accusation, although prompted by the instinct of retaliation, was assuredly true.

"Let those laugh who win," he said, making a sudden sharp effort to control his rage. "I am not quite dead yet, St. George, and a good many things may happen before then."

"Your lordship's remark is one of such prophetic originality, that you must allow me to congratulate you upon it."

"I may have a son, for instance," continued Lord Gillingham, unable to keep up with his relative, and dell blow for blow.

"Possibly. But Nina Marsh will never be Countess of Gillingham; be sure of that, my lord. You will have to look beyond Beechwood for a wife."

"Why, I'll bet you a hundred to one that Nina Marsh gives you a cool congé before a month is out."

"Done! Just have the goodness to write that in your pocket-book, will you? And now we will proceed to business. As I informed you a few minutes ago, I have just returned from Woodcraft."

"And I had the honor of inquiring whether you had received any benefit from the air."

"At any rate I derived some benefit from a sight of the register; I found that your memory was singularly correct. It would have been as well if the person who visited Woodcraft on the 31st of August, and altered the date of Mrs. St. George's death from the 16th to the 17th, had made it the 18th, and also taken the precaution to alter the succeeding entry from the 7th to the 17th, as that would have rendered the deception perfect. Be sure, Miss Dorothy, whom I had the honor of seeing and consulting, has such a wonderful memory that her testimony would be worth a great deal in any thing, and she distinctly remembers that Mrs. St. George was buried in Woodcraft churchyard on the 1st day of the month. The question is, why should you have had any interest in changing this date? Not a stranger, assuredly. We have to seek for the guilty person in the very house we live in. Your lordship knows of our family row living. Your mother we may safely decide to have been innocent in the matter. We have therefore to look for the culprit that the guilty person must have been either you or myself."

The colonel had listened very quietly. His right hand was shading his eyes, but very carelessly, and he removed it at once when he spoke again.

"I can't exactly see the justice of your theory of guilty complicity. It would be more natural to presume that Mr. Candlum had made some slight error in the precedence of the two entries."

"Miss Dorothy's memory is such, it is probable that she keeps a journal. Young ladies who live in the country, and hear and see nothing worth recording, invariably do, I believe. If so, that would be corroborative evidence as to the truth of her statement. Besides, the person who visited Woodcraft on the 31st of August remained a few minutes alone with the register, and pen and ink were both by him, for Miss Dorothy distinctly recollects that he made a great black stain on the table-cloth."

"And pray how can you prove that the person who visited Woodcraft on that occasion was myself?"

"Miss Dorothy's description was pretty accurate. Listen: 'A gentleman, tall; six feet high; aquiline nose; dark brown eyes; curly hair, almost black; and large whiskers. He wore a blue cravat, and a ring on the third finger of his left hand.'"

"That is not at all uncommon."

"No, but the ring was; she described it as a large diamond of the pear shape, set in virgin gold."

"If I could recollect myself that I was the sole possessor of a ring of this kind, I should value it more highly than I do now."

"If that were the only mark of distinction you might exercise justice on your own place; but as all the other items agree so well——"

"And even then, admitting that I was at Wood' ruff on that day, and had the register to myself for the space of seven minutes, how can you prove that I tampered with it in any way?"

"If I could get a proper fee this, the rest would not be difficult. The certificate you lent me, and which I now beg to return," said the earl, laying it down on the table, "shows such excellent marks of forgery, that my solicitor, Barbary, found no difficulty in detecting the alterations at once."

This time Colonel St. George did start, and the earl, perceiving it, smiled grimly in his face.

"I told you," he resumed, "that those who win should laugh."

"You have not won yet," answered the colonel, resuming his sangfroid, although with effort. "What earthly motive could I have had to ascertain whether Mrs. St. George was buried on the 1st or the 11th of any month I have no to discover; certainly I cannot discern myself."

"Of course, at present, I do not know what you had to gain by the deception; but I am convinced that there was some substantial benefit to be obtained thereby, or you would not have accepted the risk. This benefit I shall learn in time, and then I shall, doubtless, possess a key to the whole enigma."

"Don't be so sanguine, my lord," said his cousin, with cool insolence, and he rose from the table, drew up to the mantelpiece and quietly lighted his cigar.

It was impossible to tell whether Mr. George committed the offence ascribed by the earl's threats. He had been off his guard one minute, and had certainly shown transient marks of anxiety; but so very quickly had he conquered his momentary trouble, that, had Lord Gillingham been less suspicious by nature, he might have been deceived. But, as it was, he only felt pleasantly stimulated by the confidence and disregard of Colonel St. George. He rose to take leave, and as he walked slowly down Piccadilly, his lordship decided that he had only to be guided by the recent interview—one, a slight inkling of the truth as regarded this grand secret; the other, a double motive for his speedy marriage with Nina Marsh.

CHAPTER XXI.—WAKING UP AFTER A BRIGHT DREAM.

FOR about a week after his return from the journey which had appeared to his household as mysterious and needless, Gillingham did not go near Beechwood Manor. The earl was not fond of consoling people in their trouble. To a real lover Nina would have been doubly dear in her grief, but to Lord Gillingham—whose passion might have borne another name, if terms had been properly distributed—Nina, in her sorrow, was a thing to be avoided. But when she had wept as many tears as a reasonable young lady with beautiful eyes could be expected to do, the earl might have ventured to make his offer on the scene and try his own consolation—a coronet.

That way woman in the nineteenth century could be capable of resisting such an inducement never entered his heart to conceive. There might, possibly, be disinterested love in the world, but Lord Gillingham never had the pleasure of making their acquaintance, and therefore might be pardoned for not believing in them.

It is a fact, however, as true, that men who are too well treated by the world set the smallest value on its tenderness. Instead of a man being grateful for the gifts of fortune and philanthropists, ten chances to one but that he becomes a despot and a sceptic. Those who are buffeted about and have to fight every inch of their way are generally all the most benevolent. There are many good lessons to be learned when struggling into power, but they are lost in the process of cushioning their baby feet are apt to get arbitrary from the mere habit of command.

Of course there are some bright exceptions to this rule as illustrations in principle of any kind it is always necessary to leave a margin for occasional variations.

We know that Nina had been unconditionally engaged to her cousin since the evening of Katie's death, but it was only natural that Lord Gillingham should be ignorant of the fact, since it had not been made public up to one yet. Cyril had wished to mention it to Mr. Marsh, but this Nina strenuously opposed. It seemed to her that they had received his consent to their embrace only—that any day it might slip from her, and leave her, as Cyril had said, lonely, desolate and unloved.

Her own love was so entirely enslaved for her hopes, then would be the time to take others into her confidence, and invite them to share her joy. But somehow the confession would not pass her lips.

She had to leave them a great deal together, and, although on these occasions few words of love were spoken, Nina began to feel becoming more precious to her cousin daily and hourly; and in this new happiness, brought to her by the scene of being so beloved, she would sometimes forget for hours at an ugly nightmare that Cyril, by some magic of his own, had managed to scare away.

It is pleasant to dwell on this time. Nina's youth was coming back to her in a warm, bright flood. She thought she owed all her happiness to Katie—loved her fondly by connecting it with a name and memory so dear to her. There was no self-reproach, and no fear of forgetting the bright one in the darker. The child had wished it to be so it was; had spoken of it at the last, and Nina knew that in being happy she was best fulfilling her sister's dying request by her memory.

One morning towards the end of May, Cyril and Nina were sitting together in the pleasant morning room at Beechwood. The sun streamed in at the windows, the birds were twittering merrily under the eaves, and the smooth velvet lawn stretching out in front of the open window was a refreshing sight to the eye. Every now and then a light breeze swept across the shrubberies, bringing a soft perfume of roses as it passed. Altogether, it was one of those delicious mornings when the blood dances more cheerily in the veins, and a delightful sense of the pleasure of living for the mere sake of living pervades one's entire being—a morning when old age and sickness seem like impossibilities, and the renewed youth of the seeming earth and fragrant flowers lulls you into momentary forgetfulness of the continuance of your own life.

Cyril had been reading aloud to Nina; but the book was not interesting, it seemed, for Nina's thoughts had wandered away, and were busy with other things.

"You are not listening, I see," said Cyril presently. "I shall save my breath for a better occasion."

Nina looked up and smiled, not her old smile, perhaps, but a very sweet substitute.

"Come," said Cyril, "you owe me amends for your inattention, and therefore shall tell me your thoughts."

I was thinking of your leaving us, and wondering what I should do then."

"A very unnecessary piece of wondering, when you consider that I do not leave Beechwood until you are ready to go with me."

"Are you quite sure, Cyril, that you wish to take by the apparent mad-cap evening?"

"So sure that I have not even thought it necessary to ask myself the question."

"And you will ask me no questions either?"

"None, unless it is the momentous one about taking me for better or worse, do."

"Cyril, do believe that you will always be satisfied with your ignorance?"

There was a look of sudden doubt and pain on Cyril's face, and consequently much annoyance. She had put a vague, restless fear of his own into words. He turned his head aside that she should not see his troubled expression, but it was too late—Nina's quick eye had read him through. She had some sort of desire to probe him deeper still, and she began to speak again before he had gained sufficient composure to answer her last question.

"But, Cyril, I hardly understand all this. At one time you seemed fully had no confidence in me, and you were resolved then, I remember, to force me into a confession."

"I knew," answered Cyril, speaking vehemently, with the air of a man who forces himself into opposition with counsels he respects. "But, then, have you ever tanced a heavy purse own hand? At first it does nothing but heat its wings against its prison-bars, wounding itself in its efforts to escape. But after a time it grows quiet, unconditionally, and becomes as meek and submissive as one could desire, and craves no more for the freedom so loved before. I have been struggling my own case, though not so shy as I might have wished. I am very happy, Nina. I love the mere rattle of my chains, the very walls of my prison become precious. What is my part to me? I once told you that I could forgive any bygones so that you gave me some happiness in the present. You forgive, Nina?"

"You know I do, Cyril."

"Then what more can I want?"

Nina could not know it herself, but there was something dubious and doubtful in the tone of this question. He meant it to be a cordial assertion. He had fully persuaded himself on another occasion, which broke loose at the last, and ended in painful interrogation. He had been stifling the voice of his reason for weeks, and now it rebelled once more, and also itself heard. Cyril loved Nina devotedly and passionately; he would have gone to the other end of the world to secure what he considered his own more than man could be have remembered this terrible mystery between them without bitterness and despair.

Nina could not see how the scales fell from Nina's eyes; she began to see everything clearly now. Cyril was making impossible promises—promises that could not be kept. Nina should struggle against his keeping. He had been subjugated by passion; but in those after-years when he should feel less, but better, he would find some faith in her to fall back upon, and there would be none. The miserable barrier of suspicion and concealment that had been built up between them, wrecking their married happiness, all the more thoroughly and efficiently that his early promises to her would be broken in the hour of his doubts and fears. It would be so fearful to watch this great sorrow of a strong, upright man grow into a hatred for her, and know that she, and she alone, had made so late, after she had belonged to him for years, and her sole hope in life was the confidence of his love—the conflict of his honor and passion, of his little cues—and—

She stopped, shuddering, and cowering away from his sight. It was cruel and horrible to let him see how much he made a woman and such a fate. How could she be so wickedly selfish? Was she worthy of the heart and hand of a man like Cyril, and know it? His conscience answered her so incessantly that she never thought to combat its warnings. She turned upon Cyril with a sudden passionate attack to the very lips.

"Hear me, Cyril," she said, "I am speaking now once for all. I have changed my mind about this proposed visit to London, and cannot go. It is late and respect you too much to become your wife. I have no right to make present profit for the benefit of your inheritance. You shall thank me for this decision some day, Cyril; and it is right."

"And Katie——" he said, in a tone of stifled opposition.

"Katie did not know all, or she would think as I do, that such a marriage is impossible. God bless you!"

Then she sank down suddenly at his feet.

"Forgive me, Cyril. It was so wicked of me to think of becoming your wife. But I was mad; and I so wanted to be happy just a little while. I should must have been mad with my trouble, or it must never have dared. But you don't know what it is to suffer, and suffer until you want to grow old suddenly, to be near death. Bless me before I go, for I have loved you so dearly, Cyril. If my secret had gnawed into my very soul, if you could have been happy without knowing it, I could have died rather than give you the faintest hint. But you could not have been—not you, Cyril; I know that. For awhile you were my own, my very own, and now I have no right to you—none."

"What do you mean, child? You belong to me, and I do not choose to give you up."

His arm tightened round her waist until it felt like a bar of iron. He strained her to him with a vehement movement, and his kisses lingered soothingly on her white lips.

"You may give me up," he added presently; "but I will never yield one iota of my claims until you distinctly tell me that you are about to become the wife of another man."

He released her as he finished speaking, and she rose and without another word left the room. Her passionate, undisciplined nature led her into many inconsistencies and extremes; but she was settled now in her purpose respecting Captain Marsh. She would do anything rather than become his wife and lay herself open to reproach in after years. Nina always fought her battles alone, and was hastening past the drawing-room to her own room when Mrs. Marsh opened the door and called to her:

"Is that you, Nina?"

"Yes, mama; do you want me?" answered Nina, turning back, according to her old habit of self-sacrifice.

"No, my love, but Lord Gillingham is here, and has asked for you several times. He is just gone to search for you in the grounds."

"Oh, mama!" exclaimed Nina, impetuously, "I don't want to see him. Don't let him know I am at home."

"But, my love, he does know already. He particularly inquired for you at first, and only came in on hearing that you were at home. It is very evident what he wants you for; and surely it would be as well to see him, and set the matter at rest for ever."

"Mama," said Nina, with a miserable attempt at playfulness, "how would you like to see me Countess of Gillingham?"

"I would rather see you the wife of a good honest farmer any day."

"Nina, you are mad," said Captain Marsh's stern voice close at her elbow; "you dare not do this!"

"You shall see what I dare do," she answered, her old spirit rising hot within her; "you shall see, Captain Marsh. I won't be dictated to by you. If the earl asks me, I shall do quite as I like about accepting him."

"Yes, and purchase a lifetime of misery for the mere gratification of a moment's passion."

"You don't know what you are talking about," was her haughty reply. "I shall not marry him just to gratify a moment's passion. I shall marry him because the Countess of Gillingham will be above the reach of scandal."

"No one is above that," interrupted Mrs. Marsh.

"Perhaps not actually; but people think several times before they say ugly things of a countess. You know that, mama, as well as I do."

"I only know that you are mad, Nina, to talk in this way."

"She is mad," said Cyril, with stern reproach; "and in this madness she will go and do a thing which she will regret through her whole afterlife. Aunt, I beseech you, use your authority to prevent this. Don't let her see Lord Gillingham; or, stay—I will go into the grounds to meet him, and manage to get rid of him in some way."

"He won't take an answer from you," said Nina, confidently. "He will come and see me again, and then I shall be able to do as I like."

"But Mr. Marsh will never consent to such an unholy marriage."

"He will consent to anything I like," answered Nina, scornfully, and she bent on Captain Marsh a look of uncompromising hostility, and sped past him up the stairs.

Then Cyril went out to meet Lord Gillingham. He did not know what Nina might be tempted to do in her sorrow and passion, so he politely dismissed the earl, giving him to understand that Nina was not in a fit state to see any one, which was, in reality, too true. Lord Gillingham went away at this, giving Captain Marsh full credit for a decided breach of veracity, whereas we know that his words were sober, serious truth.

From the window of her own room Nina watched the earl depart, saw Cyril open the gate for him and bow him through with a manner of equal coldness and courtesy; then she went and lay down on her bed. Every pulse in her body seemed to have distinct and emphatic life of its own. The blood moved so swiftly and hotly through her veins, that even to the tips of her fingers she was burning with a sudden fever. She felt a tightness at the throat as if she were choking. She crawled off the bed again and managed to reach the ewer, where she deluged her head with cool water. Only for this her paroxysm of anguish and passion might have ended in madness. After a time she grew more composed; then she got up, dried the heavy masses of her thick, short hair, put on a few jet ornaments and went downstairs.

Mrs. Marsh and Cyril were the only people in the drawing-room as she entered. She walked straight up to her mother and said, in a cool, clear voice:

"Mama, I behaved very badly to you a little while ago; will you forgive me?"

Mrs. Marsh's sole answer was a most tender embrace.

"And, Cyril, I was rude and passionate to you, too; but you know how ill I bear now anything like opposition. It was, of course, very wrong of me to indulge my temper, but I have been so tried."

Her voice faltered a little here, but she conquered this tremor, and went on resolutely—

"I know you have always desired my good, and that you would have done everything in your power to make me happy as your wife; but I found this morning in your manner a sort of protest against your own infatuation. You have seen too much of the world, you are too clever, Cyril, to give perfect trust where you know it is not merited. It is, therefore, better that we should part, and I must try and resign myself to a future which is safe, even if it be unpleasant. I believe that a marriage with Lord Gillingham would purchase me far greater security than I have now. I have considered the matter thoroughly; and since it is morally impossible for me to marry you, I do not seem to care what becomes of me. My only anxiety under such circumstances is to protect myself from calumny for all your sakes. It is better that I should die honored but miserable, than live degraded and cursed by you all."

"But, Nina, a coronet cannot wash out all sin," said Cyril, gravely.

"No, but it can hide it. People are not prone to think ill of a countess if she comport herself with dignity."

"I don't understand you, Nina," said Mrs. Marsh, with a sorrowful look in her mild eyes. "I have not understood you for a long time; but I must fairly warn you that if anything in your conduct has laid you open to calumny, the higher your position in the world the more terrible will be your fall."

"You neither of you understand the circumstances of the case—you even less than Cyril, mama. But he, at least, will thank me some day for having saved him the disgrace of calling me his wife."

"Nina," said Captain Marsh, "let us argue the question together. If, as you assure me, it would be wrong to accept my offer, there must be the same objection to a marriage with Lord Gillingham."

"No; for Lord Gillingham is a bad man, and his own past is not so clear that he should ever dare to reproach me with mine."

"But has it never struck you that, under the circumstances you describe, your only safety would be with a man of honor and principle?"

"On the contrary, with such a man I could have no check. If he were to put me away I should not dare even to remonstrate, for I should know that I had justly no right to remain in an honest home. But as to Lord Gillingham, I could defy him and hold my head high besides. He is as bad as I am, and I could not wrong him by becoming his wife."

"Nina, this unnatural marriage shall never take place," said Cyril firmly.

And at this moment Madeleine came in with the mourning screen, nearly completed, in her hand, and Nina escaped again to her own room.

AUTUMN TIME.

TIME, like a wrinkled hermit, sits
  Counting his beads, each bead a day;
From his long rosary of years
  Those beads drop silently away.

Or, as a sexton, one by one,
  Puts out the smouldering funeral lamps,
And leaves the corpse alone and still,
  Amid the charnel's dripping damps.

So dealeth Time, who strips the leaves
  Of bankrupt summer's rich array,
As jailors strip the trembling fool,
  Whose spendthrift wealth has had its day.

Yet these are but the feeble types
  Of higher dooms to sons of clay,
Of shiver'd globes and falling worlds,
  And earthquakes of the latter day.

THE CASE OF MONS. D'EGVILLE.

THIS remarkable case of circumstantial evidence, though generally known to the curious in such matters who have searched into West Indian records, is as yet, we believe, entirely new to the English public. The details, however, might never have been laid before them had not the original papers been recently discovered in the Provost-Marshal's office in Barbadoes, and copied and forwarded to the writer. Besides the intrinsic interest attaching to the story itself as a mere anecdote, there is the object of adding another instance to the list of executions carried out upon the evidence of circumstance alone, and of exhibiting some of the strong as well as the weak points which characterise this peculiar form of judgment. Perhaps a close and careful comparison of numerous instances of circumstantial evidence might assist in moulding into something like a system the various and sometimes almost contradictory inferences deduced during trials of this character, and in bringing them under a legal form which might be applied when similar occasions required. At present it is well known that the law of circumstantial evidence is very uncertain, and the story before us is a most conspicuous instance.

In the year 1824, Michael Harvey Peter William Henry D'Egville, resident in the island of Barbadoes, West Indies, dancing-master, was brought up before the local June Sessions charged with having caused the death of his wife by administering to her poison in the form of arsenic.

The name of D'Egville has been always famous as the title of a family of dancing-masters and mistresses; there were some of the family, I believe, in Cheltenham when I was a boy, and I certainly was instructed in the art by a D'Egville, though whether the name was assumed as a recommendation or not I cannot say. The unhappy man of whom I write had, though a Frenchman, migrated to Barbadoes with the view of teaching dancing, and was, it is reported, very successful. After a somewhat long residence in the island, he married a lady whose family name was Llewellyn, though whether maid or widow at the time of her union with D'Egville is not shown. Thy Frenchman was not a man of good character; he was addicted to debauched society and to drink. In many of his tipsy fits he was wont to strike and ill use his wife, though he never seemed to cherish the least ill feeling towards her. He was not therefore malicious, though he was quarrelsome in his cups. Still, his ill usage of Mrs. D'Egville was so continuous and excessive that the long-suffering wife determined upon a separation. This was effected without any scene of violence or recrimination between the parties; and while the dissolute husband pursued at uncertain intervals his profession of dancing-master, the relieved wife lived at some distance, out of his and harm's way, as was supposed.

It is to be particularly noticed that, though separated from each other, no ill feeling was to be discerned between Mr. and Mrs. D'Egville; on the contrary, the wife was in the habit of sending to her depraved partner little attentions in the form of dainties, such as she knew he was attached to, as for instance fruit, soup, rare fish, &c., &c. D'Egville recognised these attentions, and (occasionally) returned them, though the fluctuation of his gains at times prohibited an equivalent interchange of gifts. Now D'Egville was aware that his wife had not only signified her intention of leaving to him a sum of money at her death, but had actually executed the instrument by which he was to be entitled at her demise to a bequest of £500 old Barbadoes currency, i. e., about £330 sterling.

It was proved that D'Egville had bought arsenic some few days previously at a druggist's shop, and being asked if it was required for rats, said:

"Yes! and I shouldn't care much if they were two-legged ones!"

Observe, that to be in possession of arsenic was nothing of itself, for there generally was a supply in every house in the island for the extermination of rats and wood-ants; indeed, I can vouch for the fact of my grandfather keeping a very large quantity in the medicine chest for periodical poisonings of wood-ants, which infested one of the mills on his estates, so that no stress can be laid on the mere purchase of the arsenic.

Mrs. D'Egville was particularly fond of toasted cheese, and at times of the year cheese was a very scarce article in the island. However, things had been prosperous with the Frenchman of late; for he purchased a piece, had it prepared, and sent it to his wife by the hands of a little mulatto boy, with these instructions.

"Tell her to eat it herself, and not to give any of it to Miss Llewellyn."

This was Mrs. D'Egville's sister, who lived in the same house with her.

Mrs. D'Egville was found dead in her bed next morning; Miss Llewellyn was dead also, and two or three of the negro servants were ill, though they ultimately recovered.

An inquest was immediately held, and Dr. Cutting tested the contents of the stomachs of the deceased, the rejected matter from the negroes who were suffering at the time, and the remainder of the cheese which was left in the dish. In all was arsenic found.

D'Egville was arrested, and brought up at the June sessions in 1824. It was the interim between the death of the late Attorney-General Beckles and the appointment of his successor, and Mr. Coulthurst (acting Attorney-General) prosecuted. Mr. Hinds defended the prisoner, resting his defence on the fact that a link in the chain of evidence was wanting. This meant of course the evidence of the little mulatto boy who had carried the cheese to Mrs. D'Egville, for negro evidence could not be received in court at that time.

The jury, after long consultation, came into court and said that it was impossible that they could ever agree, nine of their number being for an acquittal and three for a verdict of "Guilty;" so they were discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the next sessions. Meantime, Samuel Hinds was appointed Attorney-General. When the sessions arrived (Dec. 1824), Mr. Hinds declined to prosecute, on the ground of having formerly defended the prisoner, so the prosecution devolved upon Mr. Solicitor-General Griffith. The jury were empanelled, the evidence and all other proceedings carried on from the last sessions were read over to them, and after a short deliberation they brought in a verdict of "Guilty."

Extract from the minute-book of the Court of Grand Sessions held Dec. 17th, 1824:

Michael Harvey Peter William Henry D'Egville was then brought up and set to the bar to receive judgment; when, upon being asked if he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, he delivered in a paper writing, signed by himself and Mr. Moore, as his counsel, protesting, alleging, and pleading that he, the said D'Egville, was put on his trial at a former sessions for the same offence, and, therefore, prayed that judgment might be arrested and stayed against him. Mr. Attorney-General Hinds objected to the same, on the ground that the former trial was not complete, inasmuch as no verdict was rendered, and inasmuch as the prisoner had on the present trial pleaded "not guilty," and put himself upon the country, he was by that plea barred from any other. The opinion of the court being taken, the said paper writing was rejected, but the court declared themselves ready to hear anything, by way of reasons in arrest, which the prisoner or his counsel might think proper to offer, when Mr. Moore moved that the judgment in the cause of the "King v. M. H. P. W. H. D'Egville" be arrested, on the following reasons, namely—because it appears by the proceedings of the last Court of Grand Sessions, holden for the body of this island, in the month of June last, in the Town Hall, Bridgetown, in the said Island of Barbadoes, that the said M. H. P. W. H. D'Egville was arraigned on an indictment preferred against him by our Sovereign Lord the King for the murder by poison of his wife Susanna D'Egville, whereto he pleaded "not guilty," and that a jury of twelve men was empanelled, sworn, and charged to try, and he, the said M. H. P. W. H. D'Egville, was actually put on his trial on the said indictment for the said offence, and whereto he, by his counsel, entered upon, disclosed, and made his defence; and further, because that the said jury, so sworn, empanelled, and charged to try him, the said M. H. P. W. H. D'Egville, afterwards actually retired and went out to the petit jury-room, and remained several hours deliberating on their verdict; and further, because the offence whereof he hath been tried at the present sessions, and the offence for which he was put on trial, as before mentioned, at the Second Court of Grand Sessions, in the month of June last, are one and the same offence, and not divers, which said reasons being taken into the serious consideration of the court, were rejected, and sentence of death was accordingly pronounced.

This extract shows the procedure of the court (which was acting upon the condemnatory evidence alone) to have been crippled by the absence of the one link in the evidence exculpatory, viz., the testimony of the mulatto boy who had been entrusted with the cheese. The common precaution of inquiry into the conduct and motives of the person through whose hands the poisoned cheese had last passed was thus cast aside, and this not being received, the poor dancing-master returned to prison without a hope.

Here is a copy of his death warrant:

GEORGE THE FOURTH, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, &c.

To our Provost-Marshal of our said Island of Barbadoes, or his lawful deputy, greeting:

WHEREAS Michael Harvey Peter William Henry D'Egville, late of the parish of St. Michael, in the island aforesaid, yeoman, now detained in your custody in our gaol of our said island, was, at a Court of Grand Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, General Gaol Delivery, and General Sessions of the Peace, held for the body of our said island, and begun on Tuesday, the fourteenth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, and so continued and held by special adjournment de die in diem, on the fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth days of the said month, at the Town Hall, in the parish of St. Michael, in our island aforesaid, indicted and arraigned for the murder of Susanna D'Egville, and thereupon was tried, convicted, and, in due form of law attained, and now stands adjudged unto death, of which judgment execution remains to be done. We therefore command, and by these presents firmly enjoin you, that in and upon Monday the fourteenth day of this instant February, between the hours of nine and twelve in the forenoon of the same day, you carry the said M. H. P. W. H. D'Egville to the place of execution within the gaol-yard, in the town of St. Michael, in our island aforesaid, and there cause him, the said M. H. P. W. H. D'Egville to be hanged by the neck until he be dead, and that this you fail not to do upon peril thereon to ensue.

Witness.—His Excellency Sir Henry Warde, K. C. B., &c., his Majesty's Captain-General and Governor, Commander-in-Chief, &c., of this island, &c., at Government House, this seventh day of February, in the sixth year of our reign.

(Signed) HENRY WARDE.

This warrant was duly carried into effect.

Some years afterwards, when D'Egville's name was forgotten, a negro man who had been a slave in the possession of Mrs. D'Egville, and who was, by her father's will, to receive his manumission, confessed that he had received the cheese from the mulatto boy and had put in the arsenic, as he was aware that his freedom was to follow upon his mistress's death. The link wanting (as the learned counsel observed), namely, what had passed between the time the cheese was put out of D'Egville's hands and its delivery into those of his wife, was now supplied. The negro's name was Christian, and he went, as was usual, by the family name of Llewellyn. All this he confessed upon his deathbed, to the great discomfiture of those who had condemned the wretched dancing-master, and to the shame of the system of refusing any evidence, though from negro lips, in a trial where life and death depended upon evidence alone.

LAUNCH OF THE FAST SCREW STEAMER IDAHO,

At Steer's Yard, Greenpoint, Oct. 8.

THE necessity of building fleet steamers to overtake the fast blockade-runners, built in England, has long been apparent, and our Government at last ordered a new style of vessel. On the 8th of October, at half-past two P.M., the sloop of war Idaho, 12 guns, the first of the new class of screw steamers, was successfully launched from the yard of Henry Steers, Greenpoint, L. I., in the presence of a large number of spectators. Among the professional gentlemen present we noticed Admiral Renaud, of the French navy, Rear-Admiral Gregory, Com. Ringgold, Capts. Boggs and Worden, Commander John P. Bankhead, Chief-Engineers Woods and Lawton, of our navy, and many other gentlemen, ship and engine-builders in their profession. The Idaho moved from her ways and entered her destined element in the most graceful and brilliant style. Everything worked smoothly, and the launch was as successful as any one could well wish.

The Idaho's lines are exceedingly fine, and give every promise of being the right ones for great speed, the point aimed at in her construction, together with the no less important ones of great buoyancy and stiffness. She is to carry a heavy battery of 12 guns, of long range and greatest effectiveness. Her length is 305 feet; breadth of beam, 44 feet; and depth of hold 24 feet. She will be barque rigged and fitted with double direct-acting engines, with four 30-inch cylinders, driving two propellers 24 feet in diameter. Her boilers are of Mr. Dickinson's pattern, and the engines are also of his design. They will be constructed at the Morgan Iron Works, where the vessel was taken immediately after the launch. Mr. Steers is confident that the Idaho will easily run 15 knots an hour, as the engines are of 3,000 horse power, nominally, and can be worked up to 5,000. She is about 3,000 tons burthen, and we hope she will fulfil the anticipations of her constructors. She seems to have every element of success, and we cannot see how she can fail to be the fastest vessel in the navy.

THE great problem of compounding a bitter which shall invigorate healthfully, without exciting the system too much, and at once be sufficiently bitter without becoming unpleasant, has been solved by Hostetter & Smith, whose famous bitters are now a household necessity, restoring tone to the stomach and quickening the digestive organs, without leaving any of those unpleasant results so common to most of those preparations which pass under the name of tonics or bitters. Having felt their beneficial effects, we can speak with certainty of their merits, and cordially confirm what their manufacturers claim for them—that they are strengthening, safe, stimulating, and leave no reaction. They not only restore the lost or flagging appetite, but quicken the digestion and give that relish to food which constitutes half its nutriment. Their New York store is 59 Cedar street, and their manufactory is in Pittsburg, Pa.

SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—PROVOST MARSHAL'S OFFICE, ATLANTA—CITIZENS GETTING PASSES TO GO NORTH AND SOUTH, IN CONSEQUENCE OF GEN. SHERMAN'S ORDER FOR THE DEPARTURE OF ALL CITIZENS.

ATLANTA.

If you have a good map of the United States some 20 years old hanging in your office you need not look for Atlanta. It is a new creation springing up as towns seldom do South, but as they crop out most teemingly at the North, defying all mapmakers to keep up with them.

It came into existence from its railroad position, and as the war edged southward it became a vital point for the rebels. It was accordingly fortified with every care and the most elaborate defences.

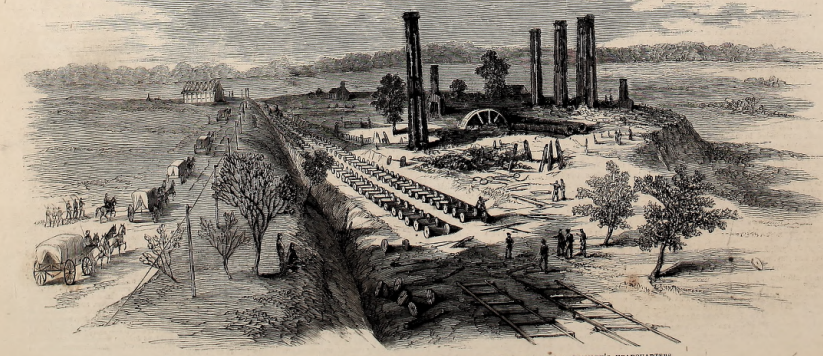
Jeff. Davis said: "Atlanta is the gate city from the North and West to the Southeast. Its fall would open the way for the Federal army to the Gulf on the one hand, and to Charleston on the other, and close up those rich granaries from which Lee's armies are supplied. It would give them control of our network of railways, and thus paralyze our efforts."

We know how it fell; how Hood exultingly telegraphed that Sherman had raised the siege and retreated, only to learn that he himself must retreat.

PRISON NOW OCCUPIED BY REBEL PRISONERS AND FORMERLY BY UNION MEN.

Destruction of Cars, &c.

On the 1st of September he began to march out, his soldiers helping themselves to the public stores as they passed. Towards dark the rolling stock of the railroad, 100 cars and six engines were gathered at the rolling mill, near the Georgia depot, and about midnight the torch was applied; at two in the morning the cars containing the ordnance stores exploded, spreading ruin on every side.



Our Artist, who entered with Sherman's army, sends a sketch of the scene of desolation that remained. Our readers will easily discern the wheels of the cars and the ruins of the locomotive at the head.

Rebel Fort and Chevaux de Frize.

Another sketch, showing one of the rebel forts with its chevaux de frize and abatis beyond it, will give an idea of the fortifications which it would have been madness to assail directly. No mortal men could under fire pierce such obstructions.

Bombproof Caves.

We have already described the caves in which the people of Atlanta were obliged to take refuge during the siege. Our Artist now sends an exterior view of one of these caves in which helpless women and children spent much of their time. They were large, roomy excavations, well-supported and roofed, the earth being heaped up above sufficiently to protect them from the exploding shells.

Prison for Rebels.

The prison used for confining our men that fell into their hands sees the tables turned, and is now filled with Confederate soldiers, some perhaps who played jailors a few weeks before, tasting moderately the enjoyments which they considered too good for Yankees.

Hood's and Sherman's Headquarters—The City Hall.

Being a new city, Atlanta was quite a handsome place, the buildings being good and still fresh. Of these will be viewed with interest the building occupied by Hood as his headquarters, now tenanted by Col. H. A. Barnum, and that selected by Sherman as his own headquarters. The City Hall, by no means a bad-looking structure, is now occupied by our officers and soldiers.

Provost-Marshal Giving Passes.

The resolution of Sherman to make Atlanta an exclusively military post required the citizens to leave; and our Artist shows a scene at the Provost-Marshal's, where they are getting passes to go North or South as they prefer. Those going North have their houses cared for during their absence, and are aided on their way by Government as well as by societies. Those going South moved out their household goods—100 wagons went at once to Rough and Ready, about 19 miles from Atlanta, where a flag of truce was raised and a detachment from each army quartered. The wagons were driven half-way between the two lines, and the exiles received by the Southern officers with every demonstration of regard.

THE MULLER CASE AT BOW STREET, LONDON.

The proceedings in the Muller case acquired new interest in London on the return of the supposed murderer in custody. The Coroner's jury closed their session and found a verdict charging him with the murder of Mr. Briggs in the railway car. He was taken to Bow street Police Court on the 8th of July.

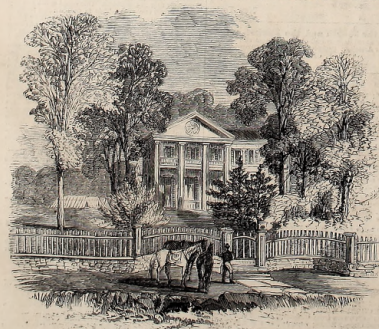
The prisoner arrived in the police van about 10½ o'clock, after being exhibited to the Coroner and his jury at Hackney.

A considerable amount of testimony, the points of which have already been published, was then taken; after which

Mr. Giffard said—I now ask you, sir, on the part of the Crown, to commit the prisoner for trial on this charge.

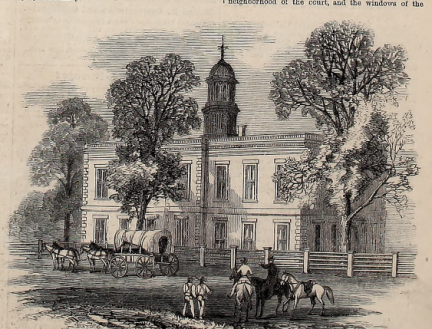
Mr. Beard—I shall reserve the defence of my client for the trial.

Mr. Flowers (addressing the prisoner)—As a more matter of form, I ask you if you desire to say anything in answer to this charge?



The prisoner, in a clear voice, said: "I have nothing to say now."

The prisoner was then fully committed for trial.



The examination was concluded at about four o'clock. By this time an immense crowd had assembled in the neighborhood of the court, and the windows of the houses in Bow street commanding a view of the road between the court and the police station opposite were crowded with visitors.

Of the scene before the magistrate we give an illustration which our readers will see with interest.

There does not seem to be much more evidence against Him than that was presented before the Commissioners at New York. The hat found in the cars after Mr. Briggs was murdered, is assumed to have belonged to Stuller, having been purchased for him by a witness who swears to its identity, and the hat found in the possession of Stuller at the time of his arrest, on shipboard, has been identified as that of Mr. Briggs. The watch sold to the jeweller by Stuller has been identified also by the jeweller Dutch, and also the chain given in exchange. The only new fact yet brought out is that two persons were seen in the compartment of the railway car with Mr. Briggs before the train started. But the gentleman who testified to this simply could not identify Briggs, or give any clear description of the man whom he saw there, nor is it certain that both men mentioned in the car. There is a strong feeling against the accused in London.

Because it is a lamb-en-table affair.

WHY are a gentleman, in practising at pistol-shooting, and a lady carrying a muff, alike?

Because both delight to bring down game.

WHY ought the old chap, who always stands upon the Common, ready to weigh you for "one cent," to succeed in life?

Because he makes his living by more weighs than one.

In a Philadelphia paper an advertisement of patent medicines says: "One bottle will set on any complaint whatever, if the patient is possessed of a fair fate." This is giving fair warning, and anybody who takes the notice after this recommendation must be "reconciled to his fate."

"HEY, George, what are you hoeing in the garden this time of night?"

"Well, I was a-civil (cry, mother, and don't the Bible say—He that sows the wind shall reap?"

CAPT. HOFF, of the Soldier's Rest, at Alexandria, tells a good story respecting a colored man who applied to him a few days ago for employment. By being an able-bodied fellow, the captain asked him why he did not enlist.

"Well, captain," he replied, "I less as'll go an' fight as not if dey would treat us same as dey do white folks."

The captain assured him that the Government was disposed to treat the colored troops with perfect fairness.

"Den why don't they draf us?" exclaimed he. "Dey don't draf us in Alexandria. Dey oughter draf us same as white folks."

At one of the hotels in Augusta, recently, the landlord said to a boarder:

"See here, ——, the chambermaid found a lady's hairpin in your bed this morning, and it will not answer."

"Well," replied the boarder, "I found a woman's hair in the butter this morning; but it did not trouble me to say anything about it."

The man looked at each other for short ten seconds, when each smiled and went his way, no doubt pondering over the peculiarities of circumstantial evidence.

WHILE walking with a friend, a gentleman accidentally stepped upon a lady's trailing dress, she turned with a frowning look, and a strong expression of anger. She made usual remarks, to which he replied:

"I am sorry, madam, very sorry, indeed; but really I didn't know that I was within a quarter of a mile of you!"

A RADLY hinged-up Emerald islander, in recognizing a lawyer, "Where have you been?" said:

"Down to Mr. Burrcomp's wake, and an illigant time we had of it. Jemmies and Judies from mimesty, and one whole noseful in the house, and that belonged to the big gentleman!"

A GENTLEMAN residing in Norfolk, who appreciates the high prices of things now-a-days, says that a mischievous little brown hound of his, one of children's favorites, and commenced nursing their value upon the hour, has become so much a part of the family, and so wedded were all the inmates went up, until they finally covered the whole skin, and the worm ever upon the unprotected. Since then that dealer won't buy up anything cheaper than a "hound dog," as that he can have a sufficient margin for the advanced prices.

THE Dundee Advertiser circulates the following story: On one occasion a beggar wife, on receiving a gratuity from the Rev. John Skinner, of Longside, a minister of "Auldwegbonnie," said to him, by way of thanks:

"Oh, sir, I hoop that ye and your family will be in heaven the nicht."

"Well," said Skinner, "I am very much obliged to you; only you need not have been so particular as to the time."

A DEAF old lady, who had brought an action for damages against a neighbor, was being examined, when the judge suggested a compromise, and instructed her counsel to say that she would take 50 cents the matter.

"What will you take?" asked the counsel of the old lady.

She shook her head at the counsel, informing the jury at the same time that she was "very hard o' hearin'."

"I better wants to know what you will take?" said the learned counsel again, this time bending at least six inches on his old lady's ear.

"I thank his honor kindly," said the ancient dame, "and if it was necessariance to him, I'll take a little warm ale."

A RUSSIAN PRINCESS.

Among the legends of Alabama is one of the year 1721. In that year there came a party of German colonists to Mobile, among whom was a young woman of great personal beauty and accomplishments, and great apparent wealth to boot. She was known and recognized as the Archduchess Newby, the repudiated wife of the only son of Peter the Great, Alexis Petor, who was supposed to have been cruelly treated by her husband, and to have fled from him, while he professed that she was dead. She came in the train of Bienville, Mobile there came a Chevalier D'Aubant, a well-known French courtier of the time, who was vacationing in these far-off lands for the good of France or himself. He saw and admired the Archduchess, and after a while some offered her marriage, which was accepted. They were married, and many months in Mobile, after which the Chevalier carried his bride to Paris, and introduced her to the French court as a princess. She lived there for some years, but finally an expose came, and the Archduchess was found to be a fraud, and had been about the person of the real Archduchess, and had robbed her of jewels and other valuables, and more, with which she had sought the then almost inaccessible colony of Mobile.

IN SEARCH OF A COMMISSION.

A FRIEND, who has been under fire, states that he recently applied for a commission in the Corps d'Afrique, and repeats the following questions and answers:

Colonel: "What is the position of a soldier?"

Candidate: "Attention, eyes front, and chest a-beckhand on a steamboat."

Col.: "How do you form a company?"

Can.: "Cut out big bandanna, offering $18 a month, and bounty, $25 down, and a month's pay in advance, and $2 premium. Say something about our glorious country, free institutions, and fruits of duty, and you will soon have your company formed."

Col.: "When you have formed your company, what do you then do?"

Can.: "Wear shoulder-straps and draw $128 per month."

Col.: "How do you instruct men to wear time?"

Can.: "By cutting a notch in a stick for each day—two notches for Sunday."

Col.: "After marching time, what comes next?"

Can.: "March."

Col.: "What next after march?"

Can.: "April."

Col.: "How do you open ranks?"

Can.: "Fire a cannon-ball into them."

Col.: "Who are the highest military officers?"

Can.: "Generals."

Col.: "How are they called generals?"

Can.: "Because they are nobody in particular."

Col.: "Very well. Now, tell me where you had? What branches are you conversant with?"

Can.: "Book branches mostly, as I lived in Indiana during my school days."

Col.: "Do you consider yourself capable to instruct and teach a company of American citizens of African descent?"

Can.: "I think, sir, I can teach the young idea how to shoot."

Col.: "What would be your principal aim and end in such instructions?"

Can.: "My principal aim would be at the rebels—the end, of course, to kill."

The examination closed here, and the colonel's company was filled up without the candidate. I think I took my hat and my leave. My commission has not arrived.

A CHEAP CARPET.—The Cosmos contains a letter from Mr. D. Tenney, telling us a pattern taken from a large tag entirely due to the work of a group of spiders in a cellar. The whole thing, he says, was complete to produce, by such help and without expense, scotland warts carpets. It is accordingly that a number of these woolly spiders should be confined over a space proportionate to the extent of work desired.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical PINEAPPLE CIDER, is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years as Physician and Surgeon in the Public Institutions of this city has convinced him that the publication of this article will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, prepared for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to those who have not used it, and in the last twenty-one years. He is rather a new mode of doctoring; never-the-less it will save many a dear form being buried, and a better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick, than to pay ten times as much for the loss of time and doctor's bills, and a wretched time of suffering, besides the inconvenience of being sick! It will prevent Cholera-morbus or Cholera, and is a wonderful Medicine Drink for cycle Cider to a tumbler in the morning, and the same in the evening after you come to the dinner table, and before you retire at night. It is a most delightful drink, and gives great action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, says that for the last fifteen years he has put ten pounds of fresh in one month at the first trial. He experiences the use as above directed, and feels it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his family, and recommends every gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly or six years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $1 per bottle (full quart). For sale everywhere. Sent free by Express on receipt of price, $3. All orders should be addressed to

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the members of the United States Army are dropping with the direct pestilence, under the name of imported liquors, and which diseases are spreading in every direction, that the public should not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "new and genuine medicines," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known then, that whatever the name, the stimulants called bitters are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are rendered more or less injurious. Containing more or less of fusel oil, deleterious poisons. HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a compound on pure Rectified Spirits, with the purest known vegetable Tonic, Diuretic, Antiseptic, and Alterative and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and sure remedy for dyspepsia and all deranged complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival. Its genuine character is also to be known by the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the counterfeits which contaminate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impositions.

Gen. Sheridan's Late Victory—The Rebellion and the Golden Calf.

THE 19th of October, first made for ever memorable by the surrender of the army of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Va., in 1781, has received a new baptism as a day sacred to Liberty and Union in the famous Shenandoah Valley. On the 19th day of October, 1864, in that valley of many battles, a victory was gained by the Federal arms in behalf of American unity, only second in importance to that achieved eighty-three years ago in the cause of American Independence.

Gen. Sheridan, under the severest test to which the leader of an army can be subjected, has proved himself the possessor of the highest qualities of generalship. The battle of the 19th instant, with its disastrous opening and triumphant termination, is the most remarkable in all the lengthy catalogue of this sanguinary war. Our army at that hour in the morning, just before the break of the day, when wearied soldiers, having safely passed so far the dangers of the night, are most inclined to sleep, was stealthily approached through a dense fog, assaulted by a heavy force in flank, and in a swift and overwhelming charge was routed, thrown into confusion and flight, and driven a distance of five or six miles, involving in its surprise, repulse and retreat the loss of over 20 pieces of artillery and many prisoners. While still in disorder and falling back, the gloomy day waning into the afternoon, our army hails the arrival of its invincible commander—Sheridan. His very presence brings his faithful soldiers to a stand. He passes through their lines; they catch his inspiration; they are reformed in a steady and unbroken front of battle as by magic; they advance; they charge along their whole line; the hitherto successful columns of the enemy are borne down. They are broken, scattered and routed from the field. They fly in confusion and dismay, leaving prisoners, artillery, wagons and all the debris of a shattered army strewn along their line of retreat of 10 miles, till the friendly curtain of night descends between them and the victorious Union legions in pursuit. Thus a field day which, in its opening, was one of the ugliest-looking disasters of the war, was suddenly transformed into one of most decisive triumphs, by the timely arrival of a commanding General, whose presence his soldiers have learned to regard as the sign of victory. Sheridan is one of those officers singled out by the strong perceptive eye of Gen. Grant for great enterprises, and the General-in-Chief, in declaring that he has "always regarded this admirable soldier as one of the ablest of Generals," pays him a compliment which adds to the lustre even of his late most wonderful and unexampled success.

The issue depending upon this battle of the 19th was Richmond or Washington. Had the enemy succeeded in what they had every reason to expect in the morning, the complete rout and dispersion of the Union army, we doubt not that Early would have advanced again upon our national capital. It is possible, too, that under such circumstances he might, by rapid marching, have effected a passage into the city; it is certain that, in requiring from Gen. Grant immediate reinforcements for the defence of Washington, Richmond would have been instantly relieved. And thus another campaign might have been lost, entailing the most serious consequences upon the national cause, politically and financially, at home and abroad.

But with the crushing defeat suffered by the enemy Richmond is correspondingly weakened. Gen. Lee is not in a position to spare another reinforcement to Early in the Shenandoah valley of 15,000 or 20,000 men. He endangered himself in detailing the column under Longstreet to Early, in order to make a powerful diversion that would compel Gen. Grant to relax his hold upon Richmond. Failing in this diversion, Lee is now in greater danger than ever; for all the approaches to Richmond, from the North and West, are open to Sheridan. Despoiled of their provision trains, Early and Longstreet can find no resting place in the desolated upper Shenandoah valley. To subsist their troops they must fall back near enough to draw upon Lee's scanty supplies at Richmond, and in thus falling back they leave Sheridan free to strike to the right or left, as the occasion may invite, in direct support of Gen. Grant.

These reflections, we think, will suffice, with the intelligent reader, in explanation of the supreme importance of the great Union victory of the 19th of October. It involved, however, only the main link in the chain of rebel combinations, designed to break the force of our successes of September, East and West. Beginning with the "Trans-Mississippi Department," all the scattered odds and ends of the rebel armies there, from Texas to the Missouri border, were called together, under Gen. Price, for a strong diversion into Missouri. Thus, with a miscellaneous army of regulars, guerillas and bushwhackers of some 25,000 or 30,000 men, he moved forward upon his mission, under the idea that the danger threatened to Missouri would divert to that quarter any Western detachments of new troops intended for Sherman or Grant. At the same time, under the personal supervision of Jeff Davis himself, the army of Hood in Georgia, en masse, is moved round to the rear of Atlanta for a raid upon Sherman's communications, that will compel him to abandon Georgia to save Tennessee and his base of supplies. The fresh army detailed from Richmond, under Longstreet, to secure the expulsion of Sheridan from the Shenandoah valley and another panic in Washington and throughout the North, completed the chain of aggressive combinations we have indicated.

Next came mysterious rumors of serious embarrassments to Sherman, of actual disasters in Missouri, and of some terrible impending blow in Virginia from Gen. Lee, at some point where least expected. Manipulating all these things to suit their nefarious purposes, the gold gamblers of Wall street, with all their rebel sympathising mercenaries, worked the market successfully in arresting the fall of gold, and in securing another rise from day to day, affecting all the business interests and classes of the community. Thus stood the issue between the worshippers of Jeff Davis and the golden calf, on the one side, and the cause of the country and the people at large, on the other side, when the tidings of Sheridan's late victory came flashing over the wires. The price of gold instantly declined; but the operators for a rise still held a footing upon doubts and mysteries which they saw in our official reports. In a short time, however, all doubts, all drawbacks to the public confidence in the national currency, whether emanating from Virginia, Georgia or Missouri, will be at an end. In this view, to all consumers of the essentials or luxuries of life, and to all manufacturers and business men, requiring raw materials of any kind, in their various branches of industry, we would still recommend economy, and a holding up, in their purchases, as far as practicable, for the better times are that surely coming. The welcome day so long expected is at last visibly dawning, and with the rising sun of the Union redeemed, our Wall street secession gold speculators, and their vocation in the interest of the rebellion, will be gone.

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA—GRANT'S ARMY.

Gen. Grant's army has sustained a severe loss in the death by fever of the capable and gallant Gen. D. B. Birney.

On the 14th Col. Gansevoort, 13th New York cavalry, surprised a camp of Mosby's guerillas near Piedmont, taking all his artillery, caissons, &c. The guerillas, however, captured and burned four or five boats at Point of Rocks, Md., on Oct. 14th.

SHERIDAN'S ARMY.

On the 15th of Oct. Crook attacked the enemy near Strasburg, and in short time drove them up the valley. But constant success had made them too confident, and while Sheridan was at Washington consulting, the rebels prepared to attack.

Before daylight on the 19th Early, marching from midnight, attacked Crook (8th), who held the left, Sheridan's line, and took them by surprise. Crook lost his artillery, and his corps was driven back in confusion. Wright (19th corps) and Emory (6th corps) made, for a time, a resolute stand, but, although Custer and Merritt did their utmost, the enemy drove all back.

At 11 Sheridan came on the field alone, riding in advance of his escort. His presence was a host.

He rallied the men and formed a line-of-battle about a mile north of Middletown, with the 8th on the left and the 19th on the right, Custer covering the left flank.

Sheridan then rode through the ranks, telling the men that he would return to his old headquarters before night.

At half-past one he attacked and drove the rebels steadily, although the fighting was desperate; but a resolute charge of the 6th and 19th corps at four o'clock broke the rebel line, and they fled, hotly pursued by Sheridan, who kept his word and returned to his old headquarters. The rebels made a stand with their rear guard at Fisher's hill, but Sheridan drove them out in haste.

We lost in the morning about 20 cannon, but Sheridan captured in all over 50, with at least 2,500 prisoners.

The rebels lost Gen. Ramseur, who died in our hands.

On our side Gen. Bidwell was killed, and Gens. Wright, Grover and Ricketts wounded.

VERMONT.

A party of rebels, whom our Canadian friends, with a view to future good feeling between us, have been assiduously cultivating, made a dash into St. Albans, killed several citizens, and robbed the banks.

Fourteen of the murderers were caught on the Canada side, but they claim their release under the decision in the Chesapeake case.

GEORGIA.

Hood, after striking the railroad between Resaca and Dalton, fell back without fighting, and was pursued by Sherman. He moved rapidly towards south of Lafayette, carefully avoiding action. Wheeler's cavalry is still near Rome, but rebel cavalry now is a sorry affair.

MISSISSIPPI.

Lieut. Earle recently made a very consoling capture with a detachment of colored troops. He seized a rebel mail and 13 Union flags captured from Gen. Banks, which were on their way to Richmond. Full lists of the trans-Mississippi army were found, and a letter from the Governor of Louisiana urging the conscription of negroes.

Gen. Dana's raids have killed 100 rebels, and brought in as many prisoners, with many negroes and great quantities of cattle.

MISSOURI.

Anderson, with 40 guerillas, murdered six citizens at Danville and destroyed much property, but was pursued and 32 of his party killed or wounded at High hill.

On the 21st Gen. Curtis attacked Price in front on the Little Blue river near Independence, and was holding him till Rosecrans came up on his rear.

The hero of Iuka is not likely to be beaten by Price now.

TENNESSEE.

Rebel troops are hovering around Memphis, causing some alarm.

LOUISIANA.

Clinton and Greensburg have been captured by the Union forces, and an immense amount of rebel stores destroyed.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Charleston papers say that the bombardment has been recently very severe, doing great injury to persons and property.

NAVAL.

The fate of the Roanoke is at last known. She was captured by a party who went on her as Braine's party did on the Chesapeake. The rebels put the passengers on the brigantine Mathilde, and fired the Roanoke.

The Niphon is said to have been blown up and sunk by a shell from the rebel Fort Fisher, near Wilmington, N. C.

BOOK NOTICES.

MANIFESTO OF DON GERARDO BARRIOS, Captain General and President of the Republic of San Salvador, to his Fellow-Citizens. Translated from the Spanish. New York: Hallet, 74 Fulton street.

If any doubt existed of the infamous character of Carrera, the President of Guatemala, and the patriotism of Barrios, the ex-President of San Salvador, it would be dispelled by this most comprehensive and masterly document, every line of which bears the impress of sincerity and truth. It is addressed to the citizens of San Salvador, and sums up the history of Carrera's ferocity and treachery. In one sense, the success of that unscrupulous despot might be quoted as a convincing proof of how unworthy the South American Republics were of free institutions; but the fact is they are republican only in name, and no more like our own than the monarchy of Prussia is to that of England. The whole narrative shows that, in their present state, the people are incapable of battling for the best. As a proof of this, we quote the exact words of President Barrios, showing the wretched condition of Central America when emerging from the despotism of Spain:

"From the date of the independence Central America was enjoying a national Republican Government, with Guatemala established as its capital. But, as I have before stated, the retrograde party, identified with the clergy, was powerful in the city, and being ill-disposed to the new order of things, it repeatedly provoked fratricidal wars, as in the years 1822, 1824, 1827, 1828 and 1829. In the latter date Gen. Morazan, authorized by other States, came upon Guatemala, with an army, to destroy the retrograde element, which had overturned the constituted Governments by a revolution and menaced the very existence of the Federal States. Morazan re-established constitutional order and the State authority at Guatemala, and assisted the State to get rid of the ringleaders of the late disturbances, among which were prominent the archbishop, sundry regular and secular clergymen and civilians of the oligarchy, who had been most active in the rebellion. Guatemala having rooted out these bad weeds, again set out on the path of progress, and although in 1832 some relics of the clerico-oligarchic faction tried again to raise their heads, even so far as to hoist the Spanish flag on the castle of Omoa, Morazan again hastened to the defence of liberty and the laws, routed the reactionists, and, two years afterwards, removed the capital to San Salvador, which had the double advantage of being free from that malign influence, and being in a more central position in the country.

We have not space to follow President Barrios through his admirable dissection of Carrera's conduct. Suffice it to say that in every sense Barrios shines out as the true and enlightened patriot, and his opponent as a sanguinary and remorseless tyrant. As a corollary to the foregoing, Barrios concludes his manifesto with two documents, which ought to be conclusive in the minds of every impartial person. They are the formal protests of George B. Mathew, Minister Plenipotentiary of the Queen of Great Britain, addressed to his Excellency Don Pedro de Aycinena, Carrera's Minister of Foreign Relations, and of E. O. Crosby, Minister of the United States, addressed to the same person. Both of these unequivocally condemn the conduct pursued by Carrera towards the Sister Republic of San Salvador. We quote a passage from the latter document, dated 2d Feb., 1863. After expressing his regret at the determination evinced by Carrera to commence war against San Salvador, he says:

"But he desires now to invite the serious attention of the Government of Guatemala to a fact which is part of the proceedings between the Governments of Guatemala and Salvador in this connection, which occurred also in view of the apprehended rupture, and which opened a a way for the satisfaction of all offences, the reparation of all injuries, and the prevention of all the consequences of a war.

"He alludes to the means of settlement or arbitration, and the opportunity for a frank and loyal explanation, offered and acceded to by the Government of Salvador; and which, at the time it was made, he hoped would also be accepted here, since, in his opinion, it would have led to the restoration of amicable relations, and leave the citizens of the two Republics to develope, in peace, their increasing resources, acquit their obligations to others, and go on with the success which eleven years of peace and prosperity had secured.

The British Minister is equally firm in his belief o the uprightness of President Barrios, and says:

"The undersigned, simply doing justice to President Barrios, must add, that in the limited communications he has had with his Excellency on the subject, he has not found reason to believe him animated by motives of personal ambition in his adherence to a policy which he appears to have followed all his life, and has received from him repeated declarations which would imply the existence of very different sentiments.

"As respects to the second point in question, the undersigned can do no less than believe that the Government of Guatemala has been very erroneously informed. He has never had the slightest cause to suppose that his Excellency President Barrios had the slightest intention of attacking Guatemala."

We advise all who take an interest in Central America to read this able exposé of its affairs, and which, above all, vindicates the character of President Barrios from the unjust aspersions of his enemies.

THE ART JOURNAL. October, 1864. New York: Virtue, Yorston & Co.

This journal, which so well deserves its name, comes this month with a fine engraving, by Sharpe, of Leslie's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme Fencing with his Servant-Maid," and another addition to the Turner gallery, his "Italy—Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," engraved by Willmore, and a very fine engraving of "A Spanish Lady," by Leroux, after the original painting of Velasquez.

The letterpress continues the interesting account of "Wedgwood and his Etruria," a series of papers which must possess additional charms to the English collectors of Wedgewood's works; an article on William John Müller, with very fine woodcut copies of his paintings of "An Italian Seaport," "Bacchanals," "After the Rain—North Wales." Wright's amusing "History of Caricature and the Grotesque" is continued, and Hogarth brought forward in an attitude which will be new to many, that of a paid worker for Lord Bute. The paper on "Ancient Egyptian Decoration" is a curious and instructive one, which might be continued by the study of the styles of other countries. "The Secular Clergy of the Middle Ages," with art correspondence, notes and notices, fill up the number.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The number of emigrants landed at this port last week was 2,773, making altogether 156,376 since Jan. 1, against 126,537 to this time last year. The commutation balance now in bank is $17,524 07.

—— The Grand Jury of the General Sessions were discharged on the 19th. They have disposed of a great deal of business since they have been in session, having found over 100 indictments and dismissed 24 complaints.

—— The first grand mass meeting of the Veteran Union Club was held on Wednesday evening, the 19th, in the Cooper Institute, which was crowded by an audience mainly composed of veteran soldiers who have been disabled in the various battles of the Union since the commencement of the war. Cannon, shell and other implements were placed on the platform, and everything connected with the proceedings breathed a warlike spirit. The chairman of the club, in calling the meeting to order, said that their club was organised to secure the re-election of Mr. Lincoln, and from information received from the army he pledged the vote of the soldiers of the Empire State for the Union. Gen. John Cochrane was selected to preside, and made an eloquent speech in favor of a prosecution of the war, which was loudly applauded. He was followed by Col. Van Buren and others, whose remarks were received with great enthusiasm.

—— In Indiana the Republicans now concede two majority in the State Senate to the Democrats.

—— At the meeting of the Board of Education on the 19th Oct., the Finance Committee reported in favor of an appropriation of $270,048 26 for the general current expenses. This includes $200,000 for teachers' salaries. The appropriation was made. No further business of public interest occupied the attention of the Board.

—— The most terrific gale and storm known for years occurred on Lake Huron, on the 7th and 8th inst., destroying a number of vessels, and doing serious damage to docks, &c. No lives were lost, so far as known at present.

—— In the Superior Court, before Judge Barbour, Mrs. Jane Bryant, aged 70 years, obtained a verdict of $1,96[illegible] against the administrator of her son's estate, for service[illegible] rendered deceased as his housekeeper during a period o[illegible] six years, during which time she took care of his childre[illegible] and managed his affairs generally. The case created [illegible]usual interest, and lasted two days.

—— The Uni[illegible]d States Courts have decided that a ton consists of 2,240 [illegible]ounds.

—— Great efforts are being made to intr[illegible]duce the culture of the coffee bean into the Connecticu[illegible] valley, which is said to be the best substitute for co[illegible] [illegible]e yet discovered.

—— The trotting mare Flora Temple is about to be sold for $15,000.

—— A Halifax paper says with the greatest coolness: "The blockade-runner Old Dominion has returned after two unsuccessful attempts to get past the fleet off Wilmington. She is going to get a new supply of coal, and try again."

—— Nearly all the Philadelphia banks organised under charters from the State have resolved to reorganise under the Banking act of Congress, as National Banks.

—— There is a new institution in the Custom-house of New York, to wit, a corps of guides. Four men march among the great pillars and intricate passage ways of the buildings, and direct strangers to any department of the customs. There are so many branches that persons who have occasion to visit are sometimes unable to find what they seek. The guides wear signs on their hats.

Naval.—Mr. Webb has received a letter from Naples, Italy, announcing that the new ironclad frigate arrived at that port all safe and in good order after a passage of 20 days and 22 hours.

—— The Roanoke left Havana on the 29th of Sept. for this port, and about ten o'clock on the night of that day the rebels, who till then had shown no symptoms of being anything but peaceable passengers, by a sudden movement, succeeded in securing all the officers of the steamer, and therefore soon had it under their control. After seeing the passengers and crew safely on board another vessel for Bermuda, the pirates burned the Roanoke. Her freight was not of great value; but she had on board between $50,000 and $60,000 in funds, which her rebel captors of course secured. These pirates were under the lead of the notorious Braine.

Obituary.—Major-Gen. Birney died in Philadelphia, on the 19th of October, from the effects of fever caused by exposure during the campaign. At the battle of the 10th he was so ill that he directed his men from an ambulance, refusing to leave the field. David B. Birney was the son of Hon. James G. Birney, a wealthy Alabama planter, who removed many years since to Ohio, liberated his slaves, and openly and manfully avowed his principles in behalf of freedom and the emancipation of the slave from Southern bondage. When the war was forced upon the North by the South, Gen. Birney was engaged in a lucrative business in Philadelphia. A civilian, he espoused ardently the sacred cause of the nation, and volunteering for its defence, was made Lieut.-Col. of the 23d Pennsylvania Volunteers, enlisted for three months' service. At the expiration of his term of service he returned to this city and recruited the regiment for three years, and again took the field as its commander. In August, 1861, he was promoted for gallant service in the field, to be Brigadier-General of Volunteers, a position which he filled with such credit to himself and the country that, on the 23d of May, 1863, he was advanced by the President to a Major-Generalship. As a Division Commander in the famous 2d Corps, he won an enviable distinction, and there were few battles in which Birney's Division did not take a prominent and decisive part. It is but a brief period since he was appointed to the command of the 10th army corps; yet in that time he had fought several battles of magnitude, in all of which he proved victor. In the movement on the north bank of the James he was in the advance, and his corps, through his skill and gallantry, gained those great advantages which have placed our army at the very gates of Richmond.

—— Bishop Boone died in China on the 17th of July. He was the soul of the missions there.

—— Col. Thomas J. C. Amory, of the 17th Massachusetts regiment, died of yellow fever at Beaufort, N. C., on the 6th of October. He was a captain in the regular army, and much loved by all.

—— Mr. Tait, the well-known Edinburgh publisher, has just died, aged 72. Some 35 years ago he commenced Tait's Magazine, one of the most brilliant publications of the day.

Accidents and Offences.—A very destructive fire occurred on the night of the 15th inst., at Brownetown, one of the suburbs of the city of Pittsburg, Pa. The extensive tack factory of Chess, Smyth & Co. was totally destroyed. The entire loss is estimated at nearly $200,000, on which there is an insurance of $53,000.

—— At Ottawa, Ill., on the night of the 16th inst., the City Bank building and four other buildings occupied as stores were burned. The loss is quite heavy, but mostly covered by insurance.

—— The Brooklyn City Mills were destroyed by fire on Wednesday, the 19th inst. The total loss is estimated at $250,000, on which there is an insurance of $112,000.

—— A portion of the machinery of the Baltimore city gas works exploded early on the 18th Oct. The building in which the explosion took place was torn to atoms—doors, windows, shutters, piles of brick, rubbish, tools, machinery, etc., being thrown and strewn in every direction. What remained of the building was almost completely destroyed by fire, caused by the burning gas. The loss is from $30,000 to $40,000, which the company lose themselves, being their own insurors.

—— Two druggists of the city were lately arrested for selling poison contrary to the statute. In one case a young woman, named Miss Ellen Hanley, residing with her parents at No. 535 2d Avenue, sent a child to the drug-store of Dr. Christopher P. Skelton, to purchase six cents' worth of arsenic, on the pretence that it was wanted to kill rats. Neither the name nor residence of the child was taken by the doctor, as the law requires. Miss Hanley received the poison, swallowed it and died soon after from its effects. The coroner's jury rendered a verdict of death by suicide, and censured Dr. Skelton "for selling poison to a child contrary to law." He was held in $1,000 to answer. The other case was not fatal, but owing to the druggist having sold laudanum without a label, instead of paregoric, as a physician's prescription demanded, the life of a child was placed in jeopardy.

—— The recent accident on the New Haven railroad is said to have been caused by rotten sleepers. The disaster occurred on a portion of the track within the precincts of New York, which is jointly used by the New Haven and Harlem railroads—just the spot where all ought to be securest.

—— A new dodge has lately been adopted by thieves. A man dresses up as a woman and then commences his depredations. One lately, in Schenectady, disguised himself in a black silk dress, black jockey hat and white veil, and while thus sailing under these false colors garotted one man, robbed another of his watch, and frightened a lady into fits.

—— Bristenbecker, late a cashier of the Stevans Hotel, in an affray with his former employer, fired three shots at him, one of which took effect on a bystander. He was arrested, and is held to take his trial.

—— A young woman in Jackson, Michigan, has been carrying on the recruiting business in an original and [illegible] peculiar manner. She marries a man on condition that he will enlist and give her his bounty. She being strikingly handsome, the man consents. After he is gone she marries another. Four men has she thus wedded and sent to the army. On the fifth occasion she was detected.

Foreign.—Information has been received at Washington from Japan that our claims upon that Government are in a fair way of being satisfactorily settled, the Japanese Government showing an amicable disposition to that end.

—— Accounts from Bermuda to the 3d inst. represent that the yellow fever is still bad. The blockade-runner steamer Wild Rose arrived on the 3d inst. from Wilmington, with 716 bales of cotton. The Banshee sailed on the 30th ult. for Wilmington.

—— The Independance Belge of the 29th Sept. says that the Union frigate Niagara entered the port of Anvers on the 26th ult., where she hoisted and saluted the Belgian flag. The salute was promptly returned by the forts. The Niagara is expected to remain in port three weeks taking in provisions. The public were about to visit this magnificent vessel.

—— It is seriously proposed to open in London a club for fashionable bachelor clergymen, to be used also as a temporary home for clergymen visiting the metropolis.

—— The London papers express the opinion that Muller will not be tried until November. The case will be submitted to the Grand Jury at the October term; the probability is that should a true bill be presented, the trial will go over to November.

—— The Quebec Convention of Colonial Delegates are expected to agree upon the following form of Government for their proposed Provincial Confederation: The Governor-General and Members of the Upper House of Parliament are to be appointed by the British Crown; the Members of the Lower House are to be elected for five years; and Lieutenant-Governors of Provinces are to be appointed by the Governor-General of the Confederation.

—— The Russian Government encourages marriage among its soldiers, provides the couple with a house, supports them, rears their children, but takes away all the boys at a tender age and sends them to military garrisons, there to be trained for the army. There are 300,000 of this kind of soldiers now in the Russian army.

—— There were 67,500 different works published in London between the years 1835 and 1863. A condensed catalogue of the entire number has just been issued by an English bookseller.

Art, Science and Literature.—It is a remarkable and highly suggestive fact that, with the exception of Col. Halpine, who has proved his gallantry on many a desperate field, not one of the hundreds who have written patriotic odes, urging men to fight and die for their native land—not one of these, we repeat, has has followed his own excellent and spirit-stirring advice. Boker writes odes to Sheridan, Trowbridge writes "Rally! Rally! Rally!" and Bayard Taylor, from his cozy parlor, urges men on to the fight. Parson Tilton writes bloodthirsty articles, telling all his readers to rush into the thickest of the fight, but he sends a substitute to the war when he is drafted. Congress ought to pass a law compelling every warlike poetaster to read his inspiring verses as he heads the forlorn hope—it would recruit the ranks, and put an end to much bad poetry. Perhaps, however, they think it as absurd to follow their own advice as for a signpost to root itself up and follow its own direction.

—— Mrs. Alfred Tennyson, the poet's wife, has just published a song, written and composed by herself, called "The Alma River."

—— So many popular French works are forbidden to be sold in France, that German booksellers in the towns on the frontiers make large fortunes by selling the interdicted volumes. One of the great features is: "This work not allowed to be sold in France."

—— The Prussian police have been actively engaged in ferreting out Madame Ludmilla Assing, who has been sentenced to two years imprisonment for her last work, the "Memoirs of Varnhagen d'Ense." It is said she is safe in Switzerland, and in that classic land of freedom, which has ever preferred liberty to empire, the recent examples of Teleki's and Arguelles's surrender are not precedents she need fear.

—— The Benedictines of Monte Cassino promise us a new edition of Dante, from a MS. of the 14th century, preserved in the library of the monastery.

—— A recent traveller, or, more strictly speaking, pilgrim, gives an interesting account of the Lotte (the heroine of Goethe's "Werther,") room, at Wetzlar, which has been taken under the protection of a society of the citizens of the town, and saved from the profanation of becoming part of an orphan asylum. The house in which Lotte's family lived is small, and must have been inconvenient for a large family. The walls are crooked, the windows small, the rooms low, the staircase wretched, and the whole look of the place shabby. "And yet," remarks the pilgrim, "from this house proceeded the spark that inspired a work of poetry which filled Germany with enthusiasm and Europe with astonishment!" The ante-room in which Goethe found Lotte "cutting bread-and-butter," seems changed; but the chief room in the house is well kept; the old papering remains, and the old stove, and many objects belonging to the room were collected in the town, and replaced there by the patriotic citizens.

—— A person advertised in all the papers that he had an infallible receipt to attain long life, which he was willing to communicate to anybody who would send him 25 cents in postage stamps. Everybody past 50, and almost everybody of wealth sent him the required sum of money, and received in return this method of longevity: "Get yourself elected a member of the French Academy. All members attain great age; for instance, M. Dupin is 82, M. Berryer is 76, M. Guizot is 75," etc.

Chit-Chat.—"If a traitor strikes down the American flag, shoot him on the spot!" has become unto us a law of war and a law of honor. Says the Lord Dundreary of Democratic politics: "Exhwaust all the reswourees of statesmanship to perswuade the individual to lift the American flag up again. But don't shoot."

—— It is doubtful if evidence enough to convict Muller, the murderer, can be obtained in England, now the authorities have him there. But a firm which has secured the copyright of his photograph is making money by selling his photographs for a penny each.

—— William McDarmott, a newspaper carrier in New York, walked "fair heel and toe," 21 miles last week, over the Fashion Course, in four hours and seven seconds, for a purse of $100, which he lost by seven seconds. The crowd made it up by subscription.

—— In describing the difference between aristocracy and democracy, it is wittily said of Cincinnati: "The democracy are those who kill hogs for a living; the aristocracy those whose fathers killed hogs."

—— Mr. Reynolds, the dramatist, once met a free and easy actor, who told him that he had passed three festive days, at the seat of the Marquis and Marchioness of——, without an invitation. He had gone there on the assumption that, as my lord and lady were not on speaking terms, each would suppose that the other had asked him, and so it turned out.

—— A rebel paper says that no one but Early knows precisely where the main body of that General's army is. It is probable that they have joined three-quarters of the rebel army, who, according to Jeff. Davis, are absent without leave.

—— The great "Bed of Ware," which Charles Dickens recently purchased, is said to have been built at the union of the houses of York and Lancaster. It is 12 feet square, the posts are of uncommon size, and are carved with red and white roses. The date, 1463, is painted on the headboard. This bedstead weighs half a ton, and 20 persons can repose on it comfortably.

—— A rebel army correspondent says that Gen. Lee keeps a flock of fowls at his headquarters. One of them, a cock, is said to be a pet with the General, who has had him since the beginning of the war and carries him wherever he goes. The General loves fresh laid eggs, no doubt. Gen. Beauregard's pet is a fine milch cow, which shares all his campaigns, and is a most indispensable companion, his health being so delicate that he can eat little else besides milk and bread.

—— A letter has been received at Lawrence, Mass., addressed to the handsomest young lady in the town, and the postmaster feels he is in an awkward fix.

—— Some lively young wags last Sunday placed the bill-boards of the theatre on either side of the church-doors of St. Paul's, Troy, just as the people were about going to divine worship. The indignation of the sexton was something terrible, when his attention was called to the fact.

—— The manuscript of C. G. Leland on "The Origin of American Popular Phrases" was recently destroyed by a fire.

—— "An armistice, eh?" said an officer with two crutches and one leg. "Certainly, I go for an armistice—after Richmond and Petersburg and Charleston have fallen, after Mobile and Wilmington are ours, after the last armed rebel has keeled up in the last rebel ditch. Oh, I love armistices; but I want them to come from the rebel side and not from our side."

—— A friend "down East" writes to us on the advantage of being a Copperhead. He had recently sunk a well near his residence, and was at the bottom of it, engaged in walling up the sides, when a laborer dumped a load of stones near the well, and one of them, weighing about 14 pounds, fell into it, striking our friend on the head, and peeling off the scalp in such a manner that it hung down over his face, doing no further injury. He firmly believes if he had not been a Copperhead he would have been instantly killed.

GUN COTTON.

This substance has again been the subject of interesting experiments, which we find described in a paper addressed to the Academy of Sciences by M. de Luca. Gun cotton is decomposed very slowly in the dark, somewhat faster in diffused light, very rapidly when exposed to the sun, and still more so when exposed to heat of about 50 degrees centigrade. This spontaneous decomposition passes through four different stages. At first it contracts slowly without losing its primitive form and texture, so that its volume becomes ten times less than its original one. A few days later it becomes soft, and is transformed into a sort of gummy matter which adheres strongly to the fingers, and has no longer any appearance of texture or organization whatever, even when viewed through the microscope. When this mass has become quite homogeneous, its volume is again reduced by one-half.

The third stage, which occurs some considerable time after, instead of producing any further contraction, causes an expansion; so that the substance, reduced as it is to one-nineteenth of its original volume, swells up to the full extent of the latter. In this state it is still gummy, but the mass is porous, and full of cavities like a sponge. During these three stages there is a constant evolution of nitrous vapors, which become much more abundant during the third stage. This evolution of gas gradually diminishes during the fourth stage; the substance slowly loses its gummy quality and yellowish color, and becomes so friable as to admit of being crushed into powder between one's fingers; it then becomes as white as sugar.

It takes at least five months to see all these stages passed through. The sugary substance is very acid, nearly entirely soluble in water, and is composed of glucose, gummy substances, oxalic acid, a little formic acid, and another which M. de Luca thinks is new, and with which for the present he has obtained salts of lead and silver. The glucose contained in the last transformation of gun cotton has the taste and even flavor of honey; it quickly reduces the tartrate of copper and potash, and ferments in contact with yeast, producing carbonic acid and alcohol. It appears from M. de Luca's experiments that gun cotton will keep indefinitely in vacuo.

THE TOMB OF PRESIDENT POLK.

One of the most attractive houses in Nashville is the residence of the widow of President James K. Polk. It is a neat and commodious two-storey brick, with an extensive front, located in the centre of the city, and having in front a large and tastefully laid out garden. In this garden, and immediately in front of the dwelling, is the tomb of President Polk. It is of plain design, with no unnecessary architectural display, but in its simplicity is sufficiently attractive to cause the passer-by to tarry a few moments and reverently gaze upon the stone beneath which rest the remains of a once honored and illustrious American. Upon the tomb itself are the following inscriptions. On the front:

The mortal remains of
JAMES KNOX POLK
are resting in the vault beneath.
He was born in Mecklenburg County,
North Carolina,
and emigrated with his father in 1806.
The beauty of virtue was illustrated in his life.
The excellence of Christianity was exemplified in his death.

On the north side:

His life was devoted to the public service. He was elevated successively to the first places in the State and Federal Governments; a Member of the General Assembly;
A Member of Congress and
Chairman of the most important
Congressional Committees;
Speaker of the House of Representatives;
Governor of Tennessee and
President of the United States.

On the south side:

By his public policy he defined, established and extended the boundaries of his country.
He planted the laws of the American Union
on the shores of the Pacific.
His influence and his counsels extended to organize the National Treasury
on the principles of the Constitution,
and to apply the rule of Freedom to Navigation,
Trade and Industry.

The west side has no inscription.

MONKEYS IN JAVA.

The most common animals here are wild boars and monkeys, of which much is said. "Wild boars are as common as rabbits in a warren. Fat, burly-looking monsters sprung out of the jungle before us, and crossed the road, apparently quite unconcerned at the appearance of strangers, though some of the smaller and more frisky ones scampered away grunting, probably with dissatisfaction at their privacy being intruded on. From the depths of the thicket, as it became more dense issued sounds resembling a series of 'oha!' uttered in a melancholy tone. On inquiry, we found that these sounds were made by the ape called untah, some of which, before we reached our journey's end, we saw jumping from branch to branch, and from tree to tree, in a most agile manner.

"A native gave me a curious version of his belief as to the origin of these monkeys. 'Their ancestor,' he said, 'was the son of a Malay king, who, although possessed of extraordinary power as a sorcerer, had but this one child, of whom he was, therefore, very fond. One day, while at their morning meal, the prince vexed his father, who became so enraged that he snatched the ladle from the rice prio, or pot, and struck the young man on the forehead, exclaiming, as he did so, in a loud tone, 'May you be known by that mark, and your children after you, until the last day!' Instantly, like Epimetheus, the son of Japetus, the prince was transmuted into an ape, with a white mark on his brow. Thus disgraced, he left his home to roam with the beast of the jungle, until the judgment day, when he will resume his former shape. 'What makes these creatures cry in that sad way,' continued the man, whose words I have translated, 'is that they pine to be re-admitted to the society of man.'

"The skin of the untah is black, as also is their coat, except their breast and stomach, which are covered with gray hair. On their forehead they have a white mark, like an arched patch, which is all the more conspicuous as the rest of the face is perfectly black."

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE DRAFT.

Since the authorities have discovered that men who are drafted and unfit for soldiers may yet be made to serve their country as hospital nurses and in various other capacities, I have deeply reflected upon the subject, and am at length enabled to submit the the following suggestions, which the Government is at liberty to adopt or reject as it pleases:

It is a well-known fact that blind men have the sense of touch more finely developed than those who can see. Draft a few regiments of blind men who can feel the position and strength of the enemy. No exemptions granted on the ground that they "can't see it."

Blind men and lame men might be drafted together, the blind men to go into battle carrying the lame on their backs. "Call you that backing your friends?"—Shak.

Men who have lost one, or even both of their arms, should no longer be exempt. Government is prepared to arm any quantity of men on the shortest possible notice.

Idiots should not be debarred the privilege of saving their country, in the ranks, when we have so many among our generals.

Draft all the lunatic asylums—the madder the men get, the better they fight.

Dumb men ought to make the most serviceable soldiers; as they cannot cry "quarter," their motto must be "no surrender."

It is absurd to exempt fat men, they are so well calculated to fill up the depleted ranks of the army. If you want to crush the enemy by precipitating upon them large bodies of troops, let fat men be drafted by all means.

Confirmed drunkards have been rejected because they are not so anxious to whip the enemy as they are to have the enemy treat. A large regiment of them armed with rifled whiskey and sustained by a battery of delirium tremens, would do great execution—to somebody.

I have not heretofore favored the idea of drafting the other sex, but a brigade of old maids would certainly be useful for repulsing the enemy. They are sometimes good in an attack.

By all means draft Congressmen. They might do a little good in the army, and they are of no possible good where they are.

Conscript all lawyers, their charges will be most disastrous to the enemy. (This is new.)

Why is the sun a quarrelsome fellow? Because he never shows himself without making a shine; but then it is only done in the heat of the moment, and upon the least reflection the whole matter would be seen in a very different light.

THE WHARVES AT NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE, WITH THE BLOCKADE-RUNNER FANNY DISCHARGING COTTON.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

NASSAU, N. P.

NEW PROVIDENCE has figured several times in American history, and the annoyance which the group of islands to which it belongs has caused us in this war shows how unwise it has been to leave them in the hands of England.

New Providence lies near the centre of the group, and is an island 17 miles long, from east to west, and seven miles broad. It was colonized by the English in 1629, and has twice been captured by the Spaniards, who restored it at the peace of 1783.

Early in 1776 it was visited by Com. Esek Hopkins, with a squadron fitted out by Congress. Hopkins took the forts, with 30 pieces of artillery and a large quantity of ammunition and stores. No attempt was made, however, to hold the island.

Nassau is the capital of the island, and, indeed, of the Bahamas. It has a good harbor, with 12 or 16 feet of water. The town itself is built on a steep hill, but is well laid out, and has many handsome residences.

The climate of the island is mild and healthy, and it is rich in productions.

During the present war Nassau has been notorious as a resort for rebel privateers and as the centre of the blockade-running, in which so many English merchants have made fortunes, and some, it is a consolation to see, have lost everything.

We this week publish an engraving of the wharves of that now busy port, with a celebrated blockade-runner, the Fanny (which, however, we believe has since been captured), discharging cotton at the public wharf. Two other blockade running steamers are also shown, together with a new warehouse in course of erection. All recently the trade was being pursued with as much vigor as ever, the local journals being filled with lists of arrivals and departures from and to the blockaded ports. At last advices, however, the trade had been nearly suspended, in consequence of the vessels engaged in it requiring repair, and from fever having broken out to a serious extent among the officers and crews of the blockade-runners, some of which had lost nearly half their complement of hands. This, and the heavy losses caused by captures, have for a time checked the efforts of the rebels and their friends.

THE COUNTRY POST OFFICE.

AMONG the pleasant reminiscences of the great Sanitary Fair at New York, visitors to the Art Gallery have doubtless still preserved that of a statuette by J. Rogers, which we give in this day's paper. The little group is full of spirit and natural to the utmost degree. The cobbler, invested by the National Government with the charge of the mails in the important rural locality, has just received the bag, whose solid leather perhaps stimulated him to seek the post, and was a substantial argument in his favor. His fair companion (is she maid, wife or widow?) has seen the mail carrier on his way, and is now on the wings of love. "Any letters for the old fellow in? How long it takes to open that bag! And there is most put on the glasses. Dear me! he knows that letter is for me—can't he spell out the name, I could read it quite off. For mercy's sake, Mr. Jones, do give me that letter!"

THE COL. LAMB,

Blockade-Runner, Built in the Mersey.

We give a sketch of a new steel steamer, the Col. Lamb, built on the Mersey to run the American blockade. She is remarkably fast, as experiment shows.

A London paper says:

"On the 13th ult. an exciting race took place off the port of Liverpool between the paddle-wheel steamboat Douglas, lately placed on the Isle of Man line, and the Colonel Lamb, a steel-hull paddle-wheel steamship, from the yard of Messrs. Jones, Quiggin & Co., Sefton street, Liverpool, and the largest steel ship that has yet been built. The two vessels were moored abreast of each other at the Prince's Stage at about eleven o'clock in the morning. Great interest was felt in their completion. The Douglas had proved herself one of the fastest boats built in the Mersey; the Colonel Lamb was a new boat which had never been tried at sea, built of steel, and was supposed to be much more fragile than an iron vessel, whilst her great steam power was considered likely to make a few of her rivets.

"The result, however, has proved that the Colonel Lamb is a splendid seaboat; she was as stiff as could be desired, and there was an entire absence of the vibration that is frequently found in boats of her size and power. Her length is 281½ feet; beam, 36 feet; depth of hold, 15 feet 6 inches; and tonnage, 1788 o. m. She will carry 2,500 bales of cotton, and sufficient coals for five days, with a draught of 8 feet 9 nine inches. She left the Prince's Stage about a quarter to twelve o'clock, under the command of Capt. Lockwood, and when outside the Rock, by to until 12.36, when the Douglas came up to her. "Full speed ahead!" was the order given on board the Colonel Lamb, and the race continued for two hours and thirty-eight minutes, during which time the Colonel Lamb gained on the Douglas about four miles.

"The engines of the Colonel Lamb are by Messrs. James Jack & Co., of the Victoria Engine Works, Liverpool; they are a pair of oscillating engines, of 300 horse-power, and have surface condensers. The paddle wheels are on the feathering principle, of 28 feet diameter. By log the ship ran 14½ knots, or about 16 miles an hour, against a head wind and a heavy sea. The builders of the Colonel Lamb have launched during the present year two sailing ships and six steamers; one steel, and one sailing ship and two steamers of iron, being 11 vessels, of an aggregate measurement of 9,260 tons; and have now on the stocks nine paddle steamers of steel and one iron screw, the aggregate burden of which is about 10,500 tons, besides one composite ship of 1,000 tons burden."

BAGGAGE TRAIN IN A STORM.

GEN. SHERMAN, after the capture of Atlanta, prepared for the next move of his antagonist. That this was to be a crushing blow Jeff Davis announced. Hood evidently moved north, assailing Sherman's lines of communication; but he was repulsed at important points, and being followed closely by Sherman, retreated southward. The mountain region is again the scene of operations just as winter is approaching. The immense labor and fatigue attendant on operations in that district may be conceived by the sketch presented this week of a bagging train crossing the mountains in a storm. The fearful road over rocks and cliffs, the storms, the constant hazard of surprise by the enemy, where escape and defence are alike impossible, give to the life of the army leader in this department all the perils of romance.

GRANT'S NEW POSITION,

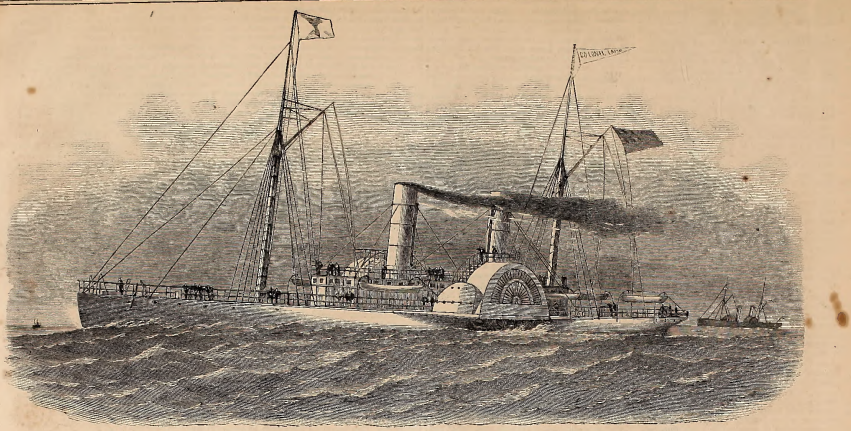
Near the Southside Railroad.

"GRANT pushes on steadily to isolate Lee, by destroying his railroad communications. The Weldon road is already gone, and the south side is one which Lee must hold at all hazards. But Grant comes on inexorable as fate. We give a view of his new position, near the important road, stretched from our cavalry pickets, and of course looking back, a kind of view, we are happy to say, we seldom give, as our Artists, like our gallant soldiers, have always their face to the foe.

LIGHTHOUSE AT FORT MORGAN.

We give in this paper a fine view of the lighthouse on the north-west corner of Fort Morgan. Our readers do not at this day need any detailed account of Farragut's gallant passage of the fort, and yet some of our engraving duties seem to require a new study of the event. Now need we stop to narrate how Farragut and Granger, after a bombardment of 36 hours, compelled Fort Morgan to surrender at 20 minutes to seven A.M. on Tuesday, August 23, 1864.

What that bombardment was our sketch from a splendid photograph, shows. You can count the bricks and estimate the state of the edifice. Over 1,300 shells exploded in the fort, and it will require $200,000 to put the fort in fighting trim.



The lighthouse was pierced and scaled in a dozen places, and seems ready to totter and fall before the slightest breeze. The rebels had a lookout on top till every pane of glass was pierced by the balls of our sharpshooters.

A MONKEY SURGEON.—We vouch for nothing of the following from Cassell's "Popular Natural History," except the story, which is a pretty good one: "The smallpox having spread fatally amongst the monkeys of South America, Dr. Pinchard, Secretary to the Bloomsbury street Vaccination Society, was struck by the idea of arresting its further progress. Vaccination was, of course, to be the means of staying the plague, and his scheme for its introduction was entirely ingenious. He bound two or three boys hand and foot and then vaccinated them in the presence of an old monkey, who was observed to be closely attentive to the proceedings. He then left him alone with a young monkey, with some of the matter on the table, and he set it a lancet, guarded, that it might not cut too deep, by a proper piece of stick. The doctor witnessed the result from a neighboring room: the old monkey knew the young one down, bound him without delay, and vaccinated him with all the skill of a professor."

EXCELLENT NEWS.—Dr. Calvert, of London, in a recent lecture on "Chemistry applied to the Arts," says these curious substances products are not only considered great delicacies in China and India, but even in Europe, where they realize from $12 to $50 per pound. It has long been considered a disputed question what is the chemical nature of the substances composing these nests, which are the product of a peculiar kind of swallow; but Mr. Payne, in his recent researches, has left no doubt in the minds of chemists that it is animal, not vegetable matter. In fact, it is a peculiar mucous substance secreted by the bird, and composed of carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, nitrogen and sulphur. Further, it is insoluble in cold water, but soluble in boiling, and differs from gelatine and isinglass in that it does not coagulate as it cools.

OUR CASTLE.

BY CATHARINE EARNSHAW.

Is perfumed air of orient climes,
In sunlight of sarcenet gold,
Which, flickering through our arched limes,
Flecks yellow on that verdant mould—
Beneath these royal, purple skies,
Here shall our castle's turrets rise.

Its battlemented walls shall gleam
With crimson glows and fairy lights,
And through its mullioned glass shall stream
The starlight of enchanted nights;
While soft the scented airs shall blow,
And hours that come shall never go.

In gardens with our languid blooms
The fireflies keep their revel dance—
And darting through the dewy glooms
Their elfin torches glance;
And in this odorous dusk we roam
Queens regnant of our castle home.

Such roses never bloomed before
As bloom and kiss our castle walls,
The sire that sighed in days of yore
Breathe sweeter through our fountained halls;
'Neath magic skies, in magic lands,
Our charmed Spanish castle stands.

With scarlet lips, the dying day
Breathes splendor o'er our rampart heights—
The bul-bul's long, melodious lay
Pours sweetness through the Eden nights;
Through starry-bloomed pomegranate trees
Flows sweet the dreamful evening breeze.

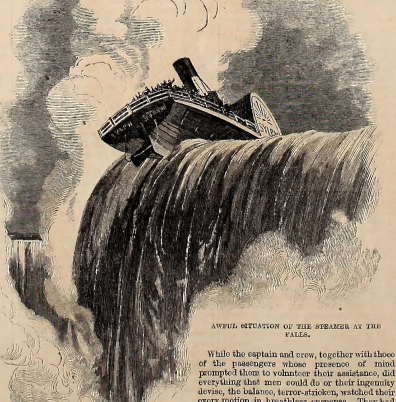
Afar, the sea in violet flush
Lies dreaming to the listening night—
And we in this entrancing hush
Quaff all we dream of dear delight—
A lonely life 'neath Southern skies,
The books we love—each other's eyes.

For you and I alone, my friend,
Our castle's turrets stand;
For us those days that never end
Bring bliss to our Elysian land—
Imperial hours of pleasures rare,
For love and you and I are there.

Wreck of the Sylph.

BY AN EX-MEMBER OF CONGRESS.

Long will be remembered the 14th day of June, 1859, by the inhabitants of Buffalo and Niagara Falls and their respective neighborhoods, as well as by the numerous visitors congregated at the latter place on that occasion.



The ill-fated steamer Sylph, which was then plying between Buffalo and Chippewa, left the former port on the morning of that eventful day, with some one hundred passengers, besides the officers and crew of the boat, on her regular trip to Chippewa, situated at the head of the rapids above the Falls of Niagara.

As the majority of the passengers were persons who were travelling for pleasure, and, as the scenery on the Niagara river is very beautiful and in some places quite romantic, in addition to the interest with which several spots are invested from the historical associations with which they are connected, the time passed very pleasantly.

All was gaiety and hilarity on board, when, just opposite Chippewa, as the boat was rounding to, preparatory to landing, and, when about the centre of the stream, something gave way about the machinery and her engine stopped working. As the wind was blowing pretty strongly down stream at the time, it seemed almost impossible that they should be able to steer her into shore before she struck the rapids, which, having reached, no human power could save them from going over the Falls.

Every effort, however, was made that men in such circumstances could make to avert such a catastrophe. Nearer and nearer they approach the point, where the waters, dashing precipitately down the shelving bed of the stream, roaring and surging and chafing among the huge rocks, with which it is covered, fret themselves into a foam, long before taking their final leap over the precipice.

What a change a few moments had wrought in the feelings and actions of those on board that ill-starred vessel. From joy and innocent gaiety, accompanied by frequent bursts of laughter at some sally of wit, jest or lively repartee, all was now consternation and dismay.

AWFUL SITUATION OF THE STEAMER AT THE FALLS.

While the captain and crew, together with those of the passengers whose presence of mind prompted them to volunteer their assistance, did everything that men could do or their ingenuity devise, the balance, terror-stricken, watched their every motion in breathless suspense. They had already succeeded, by extraordinary exertions, in reducing the distance to the shore nearly one-half, when the wind suddenly ceased blowing. They now gained the shore rapidly, and their hopes began to revive, as the boat approached almost near enough for a person to have jumped on shore, when the wind as suddenly broke upon them with redoubled fury, and, in spite of all their exertions, the boat was driving from the shore more rapidly than a moment before she had been approaching it.

And now hope died in the bosoms of all on board; and when, a moment after, the boat struck the rapids, yielding themselves up to despair they involuntarily, as it were, and with one accord, sunk to their knees, as the most befitting attitude in which to meet their Maker, towards whose presence they were hurrying with such terrific velocity.

THE LIFEBOAT.

What an awfully sublime spectacle! More than one hundred human beings in the attitude of prayer, with eyes uplifted; some frantically beseeching their Maker to save them from the impending destruction, while others were supplicating the throne of heavenly grace for mercy, and praying to their Saviour to intercede for them; home away, as they were, with resistless energy and fearful rapidity towards the verge of that mighty cataract, by whose side the most stupendous works of man dwindle into insignificance, and man himself, proud man, feels that he is but an atom, an evanescent scintillation, as it were, and, from the abyss of whose vexed and boiling waters no living thing has ever returned to life, that has dared or endured the fearful leap.

Nearer and nearer they approach; the vessel gliding along with the swiftness of the winged arrow and tossed about on the bosom of the raging stream, like an atom of foam, created from its own fretting, but with infinitely more ease, apparently, than the giant rends the gossamer web that obstructs his pathway.

They are now on the very brink. The roaring waters beneath are yawning to receive them. A piercing shriek goes up that rises above the roar of the mighty cataract itself. A crash is heard; a shock is felt; and all is silent, save the roar of the mighty torrent that is surging and breaking around them.

Surprised at the momentary respite, some of the bolder spring to their feet to ascertain the cause, when a cry of joy bursts from their lips, which rouses the rest from the state of almost suspended animation into which they had fallen, and restored them once more to consciousness. A more careful examination of their situation, however, was not calculated to inspire them with a high degree of hope. They seemed to have been spared from instant destruction to be subjected to the tortures of lingering death, with the prospect, every moment, of being dashed to atoms and swallowed up within the remorseless jaws of that yawning vortex that seemed to be raging and roaring beneath their feet for its prey.

The boat had lodged on a projecting rock, on the very brink of the precipice, and so far from the shore that any attempt at communication or the purpose of rescuing them from their perilous position seemed utterly hopeless. And besides, from the tremendous force with which the raging waters beat against the boat, which now obstructed their free passage, it seemed impossible that she could hold together longer than a very few hours at furthest.

And now the scene on shore beggars description. The news of a vessel had gone over the rapids and lodged on the edge of the Falls, with a large number of persons on board, spread like wildfire, and men, women and children came flocking from towards the Falls on both sides of the river and from every direction.

The astounding news telegraphed to Buffalo, the friends of many of those on board the vessel were soon added to the number of the hundreds, if not thousands, who had already assembled to witness the tragic scene; and, on the arrival of the cars from Buffalo, the largest train by far this and ever previous to the season it had been built, and all crammed to suffocation, several hundred more were added to the throng.

All was consternation and dismay.

The agonizing shrieks of those on board the boat, which rose above the roar of the maddened waters, and their frantic gesticulations, which could plainly be seen through the surrounding spray, which vainly strove to conceal them from view, and by which they were constantly drenched to the skin, imparting those on shore who gave to their rescue, almost paralyzed them with despair instead of invigorating them with hope and stimulating their exertions.

A thousand plans for their rescue were suggested, discussed and abandoned, either as impracticable, as requiring too great a length of time, or as involving an additional risk of life, without any adequate prospect of success. Large sums were offered to any one who would or dare save them himself or suggest a practicable plan by which they might be saved by others, but all in vain.

Several hours had now elapsed, and both sides had almost entirely despaired, the one of saving and the other of being saved, when a small steamer was seen coming down the river with the speed of the wind. Landing just above the head of the rapids, in an incredibly short space of time a small boat was launched from her bows, which bore a number of men from the steamer down to it, and started with it down the rapids towards the Falls. These movements attracting the attention of the crowd about the boat, induced them to be some plan of rescue, and having abandoned all their own, the vast throng on the Canada shore now made a simultaneous movement to meet them.

And now, while the people are all wondering at the late arriving and hastening to the Falls to keep with the boat, we will proceed to Buffalo, from whence the vessel came, for the purpose of giving a brief history of the causes that led to this new movement.

Charles Walker, a young lawyer from Detroit, formerly a Virginian in his way, was sitting in the bar front of the Phelps House quietly smoking a cigar, and as quietly looking under the bonnets of all the pretty women that passed, when a very small boy, with a tremendous pair of lungs, came tearing down street, bawling at the top of his voice:

"Extra Commercial—get the particulars of the Sybil going over the Falls—all the names of the passengers on board. Cent apiece—buy one, sir!"

As curiosity was considerably alive on the subject, Charley, for once, invested a copper, and, as he had heard before all the particulars about her going down the rapids, lodging at the edge of the Falls, position &c., he immediately directed his attention to the names. In going over the list he met with the names of several persons of his acquaintance, but as he looked upon death as the common lot of all, and as he was not unduly in the habit of meeting with the names of his acquaintance in the newspapers, who had paid the debt of nature, and as he regarded the names before him as he would a list of killed and wounded in a battle, or as victims to some malignant epidemic, he only gave a careless glance, more of regret at the sudden manner in which they had been called from time to eternity. For although he had understood that any of them were actually dead or even dying, still believing their deaths to be inevitable, sooner or later, and classing the idea of their being rescued among the impossibilities, he experienced the same sensation in reading over the names that he would have done if they had actually died. But he proceeded about two-thirds of the way through the list when he eye rested upon a name, at the sight of which all his unconcern and philosophical indifference vanished in a moment.

"What!" he exclaimed, letting the paper drop from his hand, as a slight tremor convulsed his manly frame, "Kate Drummond on board!—and there for a moment brightening up, he continued: "Oh, no! can't be, for it's only two days since I left her in New York, where it is her intention to remain during the summer, visiting Saratoga, Newport and the other fashionable watering places in reach, and returning home by way of the Falls sometime in August or September. I suppose there are more Kate Drummonds in the world than one, and that this Drummond is one of the other ones. Well, I feel some interest in her on account of her name, anyhow, and if it was in my power I'd save her just for that. But as it is, I'm afraid she's a goner. Kate, and if there's any poor devil as sigh crazy about her as a certain chap I could name—there's a certain other Kate Drummond, I think, from the sensations I experienced just now, I can appreciate his feelings when he hears of the sad catastrophe.

"I'm glad it wasn't my Kate at all events.

"My Kate! That sounds mighty pretty, and it's all well enough to talk about my Kate, but old Drummond, that flinty-hearted old father of hers, seems determined that it shall be long enough before she becomes mine. And my opinion is he shall render the two words my and Kate entirely applicable, when issuing from the two lips of Charles Walker, Esq., Attorney-at-Law, &c. He seems bent on forcing a match, if it can't be brought about by gentler means, between Kate and that old dotard, Bellamy Stanley, because he's rich. Yes, there lies the secret; he's rich, but then he's old and as ugly as sin, while I'm as poor as Job's turkey, young and decidedly good-looking.

"And there's the name, too. Hodge. Now that's a pretty name for a man to go by, to say nothing of hearing Kate called Mrs. Hodge. It would be like putting a satin flounce to a bit of calico or binding a velvet hat with gilt lace. Preposterous! Walker, now that sounds something like. There's something melodious and poetical about it. Why, I can't imagine Mrs. Walker would sound almost equal to the name of the sphere.

"And there's our fathers too!

"I'm willing to compare pedigrees with him, as to age, fortune, beauty and name. His father lived so long ago to know him, wallowing in wealth, to lead a life of luxurious indulgence and die and be a wretched existence of gout and ennui, and now, at a time of which he should be thinking about his grave, to bring into the surrounding of his accomplished and amiable girl in the whole country; and then, after managing to get her father under his thumb, to force her into a match for the sake of interest to speculate on, and taking deeds of trust on his property, and then obtaining him out of the way altogether, to marry the widow herself again, pressing at the same time to be his best friend, to insist that she should be described on the altar as the relict of her husband, and not their existing between them! I'll venture to say he hasn't experienced the sensation these twenty years. And, by Jove, although she's as full of love as Venus herself, she'd as soon think of falling in love with that bloated, hoary-headed old sinner. Old Drummond's a fool, if he is Kate's father; and if he wasn't, he'd be a fool for all that, to waste his time entertaining the idea even of such a match, much more for threatening to use coercive measures, as he has done, knowing as he must that Kate regards him with utter loathing and detestation. Yet he insists on the sacrifice, trying to persuade her that she can, and will, bring herself to like him as a gentleman, as kind, as sensible, and all that, and what is better than all, as rich!

"Why, he's contemptible, my dear old fellow, and let me perfectly willing to follow his glorious example, but, unfortunately, destitute of the wherewithal to do so. However, the want of means doesn't trouble my mind much, for I'm young, and the will to conflict my way through life with and for them; and, if old Drummond don't keep his eye skinned, I'll be off some day and old Hodge yet, as sly as the cleverest in kept, and marry Kate in spite of them.

"I love Kate, and she loves me, and Kate loves me, and she knows that I know it—and, more than that, she doesn't care who does know it—for she's proud of me, as I'm sure any woman might well be. Ahem!

"Yes, and I'm proud of her, too, and is needn't surprise old Drummond if he should happen to wake up some fine morning and find his daughter among the missing, the willing, loving, lovely and accomplished young lady of Walker, the poor lawyer; for although she positively refuses to marry contrary to her father's wishes, I have no more confidence in her spirit and strength of character to believe she would, than I have of her marry contrary to her own. And in the event of her obstinately persisting coercive measures, as I have reasons for believing she will, and of the old man turn home, I think I shall persuade her to consent to an elopement; and, then, won't I be the happiest man out of jail? Ah, well, I'll keep a sharp look over, at least the wind work of it, and I hope old Drummond will soon become reconciled to the idea of his daughter's marriage with a poor but ambition over his pillfed milk. So now let's see who are the balance of those unfortunate people on board the boat. Oh, Kate Drummond, I wish I could, but as I know I can't, it's no use trying or crying either. What awful sensations they must experience—poor devils! to be where they are a minute for all old Hodge is worth at this chance of marrying Kate in the bargain, if he has got so far out on the list.

"'Let's see, how far down had I got?' Ah, yes! Kate Drummond, of Detroit. Of Detroit? Why, that's where my friend Dunmore resides, and I never heard of any other Drummonds living out of Buffalo, horrible! If it should be Kate! Let's see who is on the list—George Dunmore, of Milwaukie. Wm. Johnson, of Philadelphia. Thomas Milner, of Illinois; Col. George Drummond, of Detroit.

"George Drummond, of Detroit!" he repeated. "That's Kate's father. Then it is! It is she! And now she's lost—lost—lost! Oh, my God! what shall I do?" he exclaimed.

And now the appearance of Phelps and lightly hearted young man rested his head upon his hands and gave vent to his feelings in a flood of tears.

After remaining in this position for perhaps two minutes, he suddenly rose from his seat, his countenance brightened, and dashing the tears from his eyes, he exclaimed:

"I'll save her, or perish in the attempt!"

Then, jumping on a cab that stood near, he jerked the lines and whip from the driver's hands, very much to that individual's consternation, who thought him a maniac, and, leaping whip to the horse, drove, John-like, down to the wharf. There he soon succeeded in procuring a small lifeboat and several hundred feet of strong cable, and then chartering a swift-running steamer, he put them on board of her, and left for the Falls.

This was the reinforcement that had attracted the attention of the crowd at the Falls, as before noticed. Having towed the small boat to a point some two or three hundred yards above the Falls, he fastened the cable to her bow, and the crowd having met him some distance above, he explained to them his plan of operations, which was as follows:

Floats being fastened to the cable every few feet, to keep it on the surface, a sufficient number of these on shore were to take hold of the cable, while he got into the boat to steer it, and then away were to go, and gradually unfold as he reached the stranded vessel. So confident did he seem of success that he inspired the others with the same confidence, and they joined in with alacrity, rendering him every assistance in their power. Having got everything in readiness and explained the signals he should make, when to pay out rope, when to stop, and when to haul in, he embarked on his perilous but noble enterprise.

In the meantime these on board the Sybil were no indifferent spectators to what was done on shore. From the time the vessel struck and they found themselves alive, but their lives suspended as it were by a single thread, they had been watching, with breathless anxiety, for some effort in their behalf, not, however, with any very high hopes of its success being consummated. But, until now, they had seen nothing that looked like an attempt to rescue them.

On the contrary, from the time the boat struck the rapids, had been in a state bordering on insanity, as one moment prayers mingled vehemently, the next were upbraiding Kate for being the cause of all this trouble and for their being where they were, at the same time charging her with ingratitude for the pains he had taken with her, and telling her that if she had followed his advice as he wanted her, they would all have been at home happy, instead of being on the brink of eternity, and in which case, Kate, and then he would commence praying furiously.

Kate, who was by far the calmest one on the boat, had in her own mind passed her father, but at the name of Hodge she could not forbear expressing her detestation for the man, and declared that she would rather go over the Falls that very moment, and be dashed into a thousand fragments, than marry him. It was this constant talk of Hodge and Kate's determination to cross in her mind by the incorrect savings of her father, with a knowledge of the fact that, from some cause or other, her father had hurried on after her some days before, and that he was then in New York, and was taking her home for the avowed purpose of hurrying on a marriage with that odious old fellow, together with the belief that Walker was created by an exhumation and directed to the little craft that had just been launched upon the troubled waters, and, consequently, hoped it might succeed in reaching and saving them.

She had been watching the tiny thing dancing upon the water for some moments with breathless interest, and admiring the skill of the daring pilot who, perilling his life in their behalf, was directing its course towards them, slowly but surely, when the cry of "Kate!" was recognized in him in the one who, of all the world, she had rather see.

"What!" she exclaimed, "can it be he? Can it be Charley?"

Just at that moment the spray driving somewhat so as to give her a better view.

"It is he! it is he!" she continued, and then, rushing to her father, "Father," she cried, "it's Charley! Oh, father, it's Charles Walker that's coming to our rescue!"

"Charles—the devil!" says the old man. "It seems that you can think of nothing but Charles Walker, Kate, and that's the thinking about dying. Here I've been praying for the last thousand years and—"

"Oh, no, father—not a thousand years; we haven't been on here a whole day yet."

"Don't interrupt me; you don't know what you're talking about. It seems like it's been a million, and I've been praying the whole time and you've been doing nothing but chatter about Charles Walker. Oh, that infernal scamp! It's you and he that are the cause of all my sorrows, and now, after bringing a fool and doting father to an untimely end, you can have the heartlessness to talk about Charles Walker's coming and bitter his dying moments by talking to him about your partner in iniquity, who has the audacity to be following you about and of course coming to put the ungrateful to permit it, contrary to my orders."

Indeed, father, as to his following me, I can't possibly conceive why I am to prevent it, this being a free country, and civil people allowed to go pretty much where they please, and as to your doing nothing but talk about him, it is the first time I've mentioned his name since we left New York. But," she continued, "indeed, father, Charles is coming in a little boat and he'll soon be here; and if he should succeed in saving us, you may consider yourself indebted to me for the rescue quite as much as for your rights, as in I think bringing him, I'm confident of that."

"Oh, yes, it's you that's bringing him—I know that to my sorrow! I would have to know where we wouldn't follow you to? As if I'd ever run away from each other that I took you away from school at Philadelphia and sent you to Buffalo. The next news I got was from Buffalo that seemingly ubiquitous Mr. Charles Walker was there, pretending around with you swung to his arm, contrary to my positive orders. You couldn't help that, neither, I suppose. Well, I sent and had you brought home, and two days after I was in town, and, going down Main street, what should I see but a young man of nice tacked up by the side of a door, with 'Charles Walker, Attorney-at-Law,' on a large gilt letter? Well, I put up with his impudent familiarity and your stolen interviews as long as I could stand it, and at last determined to send you to New York, never dreaming that he, a poor lawyer, with but little practice, would presume to follow you there, indeed doubting his having so much as to. I say I determined to send you to New York and shut you up for the summer, and when you came home in the fall to insist on your marrying Hodge immediately, and settling down in a happy way. But the stranger was going after you, and by some strange goods, I got him to take charge of you, and take you to New York, to your aunt's. When Stringer came back, I was thinking of him when he saw you last and now you seemed to be enjoying yourself, when he answered that he saw you the night before last at the ball, at the opera, in company with Charles Walker! And you seemed to be enjoying yourself very much indeed; that he had never seen you looking better in his life; and, indeed, he said you were the best-looking girl in the theatre, and seemed to be enjoying yourself in full as well as any, and, if anything, a little better.

"What, says I, as soon as I could get in a word, is Charles Walker in New York?"

"'Oh yes, says he, he's been there a week.'

"As it happened, Charles's leaving business in New York, he left Detroit a week before, and the first ligament of the old man's intentions of sending her to Saratoga was taking, while a very agreeable surprise on receiving a note the evening after, received informing him of her whereabouts. But of this Charles, knowing me profoundly ignorant, supposing until informed to the contrary, the stranger that he was still in Detroit, though Kate was rather more enlightened on the subject and at the time her father was reading her letter under Stringer's ears to keep her out of Charley's way, he was sitting in her sleeve at the piano he was so unwittingly taking the whole scene before her.

"I asked him then," continued the old man, "if he left him in New York."

"'Oh yes,' was the reply; he intends staying there all summer.

"I then made up my mind that I'd go after you and have you home, when you should marry Hodge right away, and then I'd send him to all those wild-goose chases. I went and had got as far as Buffalo, when nothing would do but you must take a trip down the river to the Falls, and there we are. I guess you've got your satisfaction now, and I hope you're satisfied."

"Indeed, father, I am, rather, you had better give your consent for us to marry, provided he succeeds in saving our lives, which I am sure he will do; and then I shall cease to annoy you with our wild-goose chases, as you call them, and no longer follow me, but I am, so my rightful owner will be, and I hope a happy family we will be. Come now, father, what do you say to our standing upon the very brink of eternity as it were, not knowing the moment we may be swept off, do you not consider your objections to Charley Walker, or do you still insist, in the event of our being saved, on my marrying that detestable Hodge?"

"Do as you please, child, I've done my duty in trying in every way I knew to keep you from marrying that young upstart of a lawyer; but as you seem determined on throwing yourself away by marrying him, do so, I shall make no further opposition."

"Oh, thanks, dear father, a thousand thanks," exclaimed Kate, clasping her father in her arms, and covering his face with kisses. "I knew when you became convinced what a noble fellow you'll love him—you can't help it. But while we've been talking, Charles has reached us in safety, thank heaven!" Kate, as she spoke, was at his boat by the side of them, which, having reached it, he sprang boldly to the deck of the steamer, and the next moment he was clasped in Kate's fair white arms, and he was smothering her with kisses. As soon as she could get to speak, she told him that her father had yielded up his objections to their marriage.

"Yes," says the old man, taking hold of his daughter's hand and placing it in Charley's, "here take her, and make much of her, for I'm afraid I could to prevent it; so you needn't stop to thank me; but as you've captain of that craft that lays alongside of us, and I feel very much inclined here, suppose we make a trade. I give you Kate, and you give me a passage to the shore."

Accordingly the stranger came around the old man, he swung him over the edge of the steamer and deposited him in his own little craft. Then springing down himself he placed Kate next her by the side of her father. In the same moment he filled it to its utmost capacity with women from the Sybil, and had a look in it, when the next rose before the balance on board were aware of what he was about, so rapid were his movements.

And now a wail went up from those left on the steamer, begging in most piteous terms not to be abandoned to their fate! But on being assured that it was impossible to take any more on board at that time, and that the boat should immediately return, they ceased their lamentations and resigned themselves calmly to whatever fate Providence might have in store for them.

The signal having been given, the boat began to move slowly up the stream and towards the shore, which they soon reached in safety; and other persons volunteering to take charge of the lifeboat and see that the balance of the passengers were brought ashore, Charles and Kate, accompanied by Kate's father, jumped on board the steamtug, which had brought Charles to the scene of action, and returned rejoicing to Buffalo.

In the course of a couple of hours from this time they left the last person on board the Sylph had left her to her fate, and reached the shore amid the congratulations of their friends, and in a half hour more she was floating in a million fragments below the Falls.

That evening a small party, consisting of a few of the most intimate friends of the parties, were assembled together in the parlor of the Phelps House for the purpose of witnessing the consummation of the bargain, entered into on board the steamer Sylph, between Colonel Drummond on the one part, and Charles Walter on the other, when and where Kate Drummond became the happy bride of her dear Charles, and Charles himself, as he had anticipated, the happiest man out of jail.

The old colonel also, his wife having once more resumed their legitimate functions, was so happy at realizing the fact that he was actually once more on terra-firma, that he not only forgave Charles and Kate for the trouble they had given him, but was unable to find words to express his gratitude to the former for so nobly perilling his own life to save theirs:

"You've won her, my boy," said he, "and nobly won her too. Fortune favors the bold. You're worthy of each other, and I'm proud of you both. I see now, and confess it with shame, that I was a fool in wanting to sacrifice such a jewel as Kate on the altar of Mammon, though in fact I was so infatuated that I never looked upon it before in the light of a sacrifice, and I thank God that my steps were arrested before the unhallowed deed was consummated; though from what I've seen of you, Charley, I have not the slightest doubt the sacrifice would ever have been made even if this accident had not have happened, as I'm pretty well convinced that you and Kate would have contemplated us in the end. However, that's all over with now, thank fortune, and may all your anticipations of happiness be more than realized. So good-night, and God bless you both."

The next morning they left for home on one of the magnificent lake steamers, where they arrived without further accident. The following morning they learned that Hodge had died very suddenly a few days before, leaving all his property to Kate, to dispose of as she might think proper, while she immediately did by delivering the papers into the hands of her husband.

Through courtesy, and by way of showing their respect for the memory of the lamented defunct, they went into mourning, but then the parties and merry-makings, of which they were the life and soul for some weeks thereafter, were suggestive of anything rather than sorrow, they seeming to bear the unhappy misfortune with a most astonishing degree of resignation.

AMONG THE SHEAVES.

Among the sheaves—the golden sheaves,
An empty heart, I walk forlorn;
How sadly sigh the older leaves—
I loathe those fields of mellow corn!

Among the sheaves—the golden sheaves,
My heart is full, new hopes are born;
My heart in faint—for Hope deceives;
My passion may be met by scorn!

Among the sheaves—the golden sheaves,
My Love is wan! No more forlorn,
How sweet the whispering Adair leaves—
I bless those fields of mellow corn!

THAT MARTHA.

BY MARY KYLE DALLAS.

"For my part," said Mrs. Maltby, as our party came out of the theatre one night after witnessing the cruel fate of that ill-used female, Desdemona, "I'm sure if I've always pitied Othello, poor man! You see I was jealous myself once, and know what it must be."

Jealous of such a man as Mr. Maltby—that couldn't be, so we declared, but the little woman insisted on the truth of her assertion, and while spread at a tent back in the carriage with the gentlemen out of hearing in front, "If you'll promise never to tell any one you shall hear all about it?" Which daughter of Eve would resist such an inducement. The promise was given and on came the story:

I can't bear the name of Martha even yet without having my blood boil in the silliest way. And when my cheeks are at the reddest, and my heart beats the loudest, I suddenly remember what a goose I am, and cool down again. The first time I ever heard that name to take much notice of it was on the porch of our house at Brownsville. We had been married just three years, Mr. Maltby and I, and we had a very happy life. We had had some trouble to get along at first, but as old uncle of Tom's had died and remembered him in his will, to Tom's astonishment, for he always thought he had been disinherited for putting on his uncle's dressing-gown and slippers and playing he had the gout, using naughty language to the little black boy, and going on just like the old gentleman. Tom was only ten then, and boys will be boys, you know. So he was delighted when he discovered that the old gentleman hadn't forbidden his thing, and often said he would have given a great deal to have been reconciled before he died, for since that day behind, never entered his uncle's house, but I told him the hand of fate was in it, and he couldn't help it, you know; so as soon as he got possession of the money he bought that place of ours at Brownsville and we began to enjoy ourselves. And I was so happy, my dear, that I used to say that if we only kept a cow and had our own butter, and a few chickens and fresh eggs, Maltby cottage would be an earthly paradise.

Living so far from the city it was not easy to have lots of visitors and as Tom was fond and likes you, the neighbors were such upstarts that they wouldn't sell you an egg or a quart of milk if they could get a dollar apiece for the pigs or roasted them. There wasn't a farmhouse for miles. They were all villas or residences, and when Mr. Bonnyhell, with whom I had dealt for milk all the time I lived in the city, retired from business and bought a stone house with two turrets, and Hebe in the garden pouring the contents into a marble basin, and I sent up word by Bridget that I was going to make a custard, and could they spare me a dozen eggs, the answer was sent back word, 'her compliments to Mrs. Maltby, and she wondered at her impudence, and she didn't keep shop.' Set a butcher on purchase and he'll ride as far as the horse will go. And as for bakers, when I heard of the 'residence of Terence O'Grady, Esq.,' I never thought he was ours where we used to buy the buns we were always so fond of in the morning. But, dear me, I'm forgetting all about Martha.

We hadn't been at the cottage three weeks when nurse Glower came to visit us. She only stayed—I could remember her from the time I was that high—and she was always at our house when I was a child at least once a year. She was very fond of me and meant for the best, but was, perhaps she wasn't quite judicious. I don't think she was, for economics is a wholesome treat for a child, though it don't always agree with it at the moment having one—and something like the chicken-pox is—several times.

When I was married at sixteen she always promised to visit me, and when I went to the cottage she came; we hadn't had room for her before, for to tell the truth Tom's income was a sofa-bedstead, and laid the pots and kettles in an ottoman when we had company, because we hadn't any kitchen.

Somehow, though, Tom never liked nurse. So he provoked me by going out a good deal more often evenings than he ever had before, under she came—and by sitting by himself on the front steps smoking until after midnight. Nurse Glower was afraid of rheumatism, and considered the night air poison, so I couldn't well ask her to join him without leaving her, and that I was too fond of Tom, maybe I looked a little low-spirited one evening, for nursey said to me, in such a meaning way:

"Hang it, is your life a happy one, or do you find that marriage is all what it's cracked up to be?"

She was not particular about her grammar, dear old soul, and always said "we" for "v."

"Happy! oh, yes. Tom is the best of husband's."

"Easy to be the best," said nurse, "for they're a worry and lot now, I tell you. One thing I'll say of Mr. Maltby, he's a good provider. But is he devoted?"

"Devoted! Oh, I'm sure he is," said I.

"Ah," said nurse Glower, "that's a young thing thinks so and is deceived. Husbands is pardicular by nature. Him as was down upon his bended knees a saint and a courting and talking like as if he'd commit self suicide if twas so t'ahe wouldn't have him when his wife's gal, is just the worry one to go a-flirting awantin' by the time she's had her first. Lor, I've nursed a many ladys, and I never knowed one as had had her second as could put her head down on her husband and say, 'there, I hev him ev'nin's.' They're worse than foxes—husbands is!"

"Not all," I began.

"All!" said nurse Glower. "I'd like to scuth your feelins and say 'some isn't,' but truth's truth, and as I've said afore, they're all alike. Glower was; that I know, and that I stick to, and allers will!"

I knew Mr. Glower had not been what you might call a domestic man, and I began to think might have been prejudiced by his conduct. Still my heart sunk at my bosom like a lump of lead, and though I tried to look pleasant, and made much of the warm sangaree she always took before she went to bed, I felt dreadful, and if I smiled it was only to hide my tears.

When your spirits begin to go down it's very hard to make them rise again, and when nurse Glower would not go to bed, instead of running downstairs to sit on the porch, as I had first intended, I took my seat on the broad sill of the open bedroom window, and began to wonder what I should do if I were to discover anything dreadful about Tom.

I can't say that I perceived myself I could see his dear curly head with wreaths of fair hair about it, and the more I looked at it the more I choked up, until at last I said:

"I'll go down and sit with him. If there is only one good husband in the world, Tom is the man."

If I only had done what I intended at that very moment, I should have been spared a great deal of trouble. But my evil star made me stop to let nurse get out of sight, and I shouldn't see I had been crying, and just in that little while nurse had come up to the garden fence, stopped, took off her specs, and said:

"Mr. Maltby—I say, sir!"

Tom went down to the gate, only a few steps, and not only could I hear but see him perfectly in the moonlight, and there was something mysterious and secret in the very back.

"I've come from Turner's, sir," said the man. "My way being this, the lady ast me would I stop in and tell Mr. Maltby if he cares about seeing Martha he must come up in a few days; she won't be here long."

He spoke in a coarse, high-pitched voice, and I saw my husband put his hand upon his arm and point warningly towards the house.

"Hush! This is a little secret, you know," he said. "I don't want any one to hear."

"Keeping it from the missus, I reckon," said the man, with a gruff laugh.

My husband nodded.

"Tell t'be lady I'd not miss seeing Martha for the world," he said; "that I'll be there to-morrow if possible, and here is something for your trouble."

The man muttered a thank you, and added, with a laugh:

"She's a splendid creature, sir."

"I don't know her equal," said my husband.

Him, my dear, who had promised to cherish and protect me at the altar—only think of that! And he had so often told me that I hadn't my equal in the world. Of course it isn't so, you know; but one's weak enough to think so, whether any one else does so or not.

And that horrible man went away, and Tom came slowly sauntering up the path as though nothing had occurred worth think of, and I, poor creature, I felt sorry for myself, as though I had been some one else, and slipped down from the window-sill and sat upon the floor. Oh, how I cried! Softly, though, for I had made a vow that he should never have the least suspicion that I had found him out.

What a desolate life mine seemed when I was forced to keep it! Nurse Glower was right and that men were all villains.

The next day—my dear, I've read how men who have been executed passed the night, I'm sure not one of them suffered a bit, and never could then did I guess myself how much I thought of Tom, but wonder that I lived through it—when at the breakfast table I said:

"Why, puss, you look pale. You are not ill, I hope?"

I could have burst into tears, and nurse Glower saw it, and said she:

"Pops mrs. Maltby sat up late last night. Late hours ain't healthy, you know, sir."

Well, he gave her such a look; he might just as well have said "Mind your own business" outright, and I felt so glad. Dear old soul, if she could have known what I knew!

After breakfast I watched Tom. Of course he would go to see Martha—that abominable, shameful, good-for-nothing Martha—but where? that was the question. Of course he'd try to elude observation, if possible; the guilty always awaken suspicion by their manner, I thought. I could wait. There was a long life of misery before me, and I was not in a hurry for it to begin. But one thing I had resolved upon—to discover—oh, that horrid Martha!—saw my husband, she should also see his injured wife.

Yesterday, to be idle and unconcerned, I saw it was all humbug. Tom loitered about the house all the morning, and strolled a gate and pat a new puppy to the fence-palings, and even sat down at luncheime and had a splendid repast for raspberries and cream. After lunch, he said:

"I'll smoke my cigar in the arbor, puss," and went out.

Oh, how my heart beat! I was after him in a moment. Sham enough, he had his cap on, and was just going out of the gate. I called after him:

"I thought you were going to smoke a cigar in the arbor?"

"So I was," said Tom; "but I've changed my mind. I think I'll take a stroll."

"But with such a day!"

"My love, the middle of the day!" said Tom.

"Oh, it's a cool day," I answered. "Besides, I should think it would hurt you if it were so bad for me."

"Oh, I'm a strong man," he said, "and you are a delicate little woman. Besides, your complexion—"

"Oh, now I am married, who cares for my complexion?" I said. "I'll take a parasol."

Tom stood drumming with his fingers on the fence and whistling. In a minute he said:

"Look here, puss. I'm going out on business, and you'd be in the way. So I can't have the pleasure of your company. Bye-bye! We'll talk matters over this evening."

"Will we," I said to myself. "Ah, before evening you little know what we may happen, Tom."

And unfortunately I looked towards the sharp pruning-knife that lay upon the bench under the grape vines.

I dare say, I hope I shan't shock you, but if I had been a Othello that day I should not have smothered Desdemona, because when I looked at the carving-knife I thought of that abominable Martha.

I watched him out of sight, and then ran to get my bonnet. If he went to the Turners I knew he'd have to pass the house before him by a short path which crossed our next neighbors' garden, and saved a quarter of a mile. I should run all the way, and be very sunstruck, even when he used to come a courting.

How I got there I never knew, but there I was hiding behind a thick tree all of a trouble when Tom came up whistling, for whistling as though there were no such thing as perfidy in the wide world.

He knocked at the door, and old Mrs. Turner opened it (she knew of his coming, and could speak in a bass part); and when she was inside I crept up to the window and listened. And she first thing I heard him say was:

"I feel hard work not to hring my wife along."

Then Mrs. Turner laughed, and said:

"That would have been a joke; she don't suspect nothin', does she?"

"Guess not," said Tom: "How's Martha?"

"She's out yonder," said old Mrs. Turner. "Such an uncasy critter I never saw. I shall be glad to get rid of her; besides, we haven't room enough to keep her, that's a fact. You've decided what to do, I s'pose."

"I do," said Tom, "I've engaged Johnson, the carpenter, to build a first-rate house for her Near as I can tell I want do better."

A house! I should hear of a carriage and pin-money next. Oh, well might our dear old minister talk of riches being a snare. When we were poor, Tom never thought of building houses for Martha, and I never heard of such a thing except in English novels. Well, I should have one friend at least. There was nurse Glower; she would take my home to me and pa, to do. I came near fainting; but what I heard next aroused me.

Tom spoke, and he said:

"Come, let's go and see my Martha."

He Martha—his—oh! and all the injured wife blazed up in my bosom, as well it was. Yes, he might go and see his Martha, and I would go and find Martha—my husband's Martha also.

And I opened the door so softly, though I had been a housebreaker, and glided in like a snake. Oh, mercy me! that wicked old Mrs. Turner was just going the way out of the room, and their backs were towards me, and they didn't see me. So I followed, and all that kept me up was the thought that I should know more than Tom knew, and that he would know that he had killed me and feel remorse at last.

Along the hall they went, and out of the back door. Probably that woman was waiting in the garden.

Mrs. Turner went on talking:

"Snkey is as jealous of her as she can be," she said. "You never saw such a jealous creature!"

"I'm sure poor Martha's with other names—was Tom a grand Turk, or a Bluebeard, then I'm prepared for anything. But Mrs. Turner had stopped before the barn, and was taking a key from her pocket.

"I hated to lock her up," she said, "such a splendid day; but if I didn't she'd run away, and I feel responsible."

Locked up. What could it mean? Was Tom an ogre to fasten women up in barns? I stared at Mrs. Turner as if I would eat her up when I got at, oh, don't you pity me—I, a lawful wedded wife, who had loved my husband better than my life; I watched him say when she had gone:

"My beauty, Don't you know me, Martha? I'm going to take you home next week; and Sukie is packing."

And the next instant my husband walked out of the barn, leading the most beautiful dun cow that I ever saw in all my life, and talking to her as if he had been a child:

"What will your mistress say to you, Martha?" he said. "I will she like you, my beauty? How many quarts a day will you give, eh? Turner? Puss—excuse me, I call my cow Puss sometimes—Puss always has said all we need at the cottage is a cow and chickens, and she'll be delighted with Martha; but she hasn't been saying about it until she is in her house, and then she'll be delighted with the churn and milkpails and all—and we'll have the new milk from Mrs. Turner. My wife adores a little dairy and fresh eggs and butter."

I had been jealous of an old cow. I didn't wait to hear more I can assure you, but crept out of the yard and away through the hill into the road, as though I had wings on my feet.

When Tom came home I was sitting on the piazza swing, and how I kissed him. It seemed as if nobody in the world had been tormented out of heaven and then taken back again.

That horrid nurse Glower began to abuse my husband again that night, but I cut her short immediately.

"I don't know anything about bad husbands," I said, "but I know good ones are blessings, and Tom is the best husband in the world."

All her insinuations did no harm after that, and she went away pretty soon, and said to all our folks that for old fashioned people we were pearls standing we were the silliest she ever saw.

I never told any one of my fit of jealousy, and Tom never guessed a word about it. How should he? But when baby was born, and I said:

"What shall we name her?"

"You have a mighty prejudice against the name?" said Tom, smiling.

"Well," said I, "I have; for a woman it's perfectly dreadful, but it's a splendid name for an old cow. I'm glad ours has it, and always have been."

"Why?" asked Tom, but I didn't tell him.

A ROYAL HUNT BY MODERN TIMES.—A correspondent writes from Rome to report upon the King of Italy's hunting encampment in the Maritime Alps: "A favorable spot was chosen for that where I write, on the summit ridge of that chain of mountains, very nearly related to the Col di Tenda, and overlooking it. The evening when the King was expected to arrive at Limone, a large number of persons were all assembled on San Martino di Lantosca, and next morning at six a.m. the hunting, including some pressed peasants and the musicians of the place, started on a four hours' walk to a place where to rim where we halted to breakfast on their severities. A dozen snowy tents, occupying one side of the valley, had been pitched for the royal party. Near at hand a number of horses were picketed, and many more grooms and gens provided hunting-clothes for the encampment. The King and his suite, though numerous, were not to be seen in hunting about with one or two friends, among the rocks. He dressed in a shooting-coat and waistcoat of English pattern and sergeant tartan pantaloons. Cousin puts more the thousand his dress and that of his friends from the dress of English sportsmen. He ascertained that he had shot but one chamois, and did not intend to shoot again that day. There was something noble in a King being satisfied with so little game, and that so hard of attainment in regions so wild. Chamois, however, were the principal object, and a large number of men were employed in driving them down from the tops in the direction that on the following day he and his friend might have a better chance of coming upon them."

BIANCA.

BY ADA VROOMAN.

No wild Bacchante, tendril-crowned,
No sad-eyed vineyard saint was she,
A maid, instead, who sweetly frowned,
And sweetly smiled at sight of me.

You say she loved me? Well, what then?
No harm was done! so bright a smile
Was never meant for other men—
And I had no'er a thought of guile.

It was the vintage—half divine
The day, from rise to set of sun,
And flushing dark with amber wine,
The ripened grapes dropped one by one.

Across the wide Campagna came
At even a wind with cooler eyes,
Ablaze with more than sunset flame—
Oh, happy youth, too over-wise!

You know that in the vineyard shade,
A star within its purple gloom,
She waited—flower, dearest maid,
That ever blushed 'neath trysting bloom.

You felt that smile was all for you,
That languid sweetness in her mien—
And glowed in triumph as you drew
Her olive fingers to between.

Yours, whiter far, and bent to kiss
Each softly rounded finger-tip;
Then, growing bolder in your bliss,
The pouting crimson of her lip.

You saw her heart's quick throbbing stir
The curious kerchief on her breast,
And heard, above the downy whirr
Of doves returning to their nest,

Her murmured welcome—murmured low
In that sweet language of the South
Whose very echoes melt and flow
Into—"I love!" in Beauty's mouth.

She loved me well; yet now I mourn,
Perhaps my memory—yet 'tis not so—
She was not one to falsely scorn,
And feign a love she did not know.

I wish she had been—simple girl!
It would have saved a world of pain,
But no—that thought itself a pearl
Not lightly to be touched again.

She thought I loved her; was she wrong?
I thought I loved her for an hour,
I only marred 'twas so long.
Since e'er was boundless power,

Another mistress reigned supreme—
My Art, my lissful One, my All!
I could not dream she was a dream,
Nor stay when she should choose to call.

And she did call me. "Venice waits
Thy skilful pencil, as of old."
She waited for her Doge—her gates
Adorned with purple and with gold."

And I—"Bianca, do not grieve!
My duty, and—nay, kiss me, dear!
Believe me, sweet, I do not leave
This Rome and thee without a tear."

I paused in doubt; no word she said,
But clasping close a shining vine,
In slow, still anger turned her head—
"Thou hast thy path—I, too, have mine,"

This was our parting. Thence I took
The road to Venice. Some a year
Had faded, when a whisper shook
My every nerve with thrilling fear.

"Last week a peasant girl in Rome
Died by her own dark, desperate hand;
No one had known her, but her home,
She said, was not in any land.

"And life was chill, and dark, and sad
(Some thought she mourned an absent love),
And she had naught to make her glad—
Twas brighter—happier far above."

And hidden next her heart, they say,
Was found a tablet, and the name
Was whispered me—I turned away
Brow-flushed with burning grief and shame.

NINA MARSH;

OR,

THE SECRET OF THE MANOR.

CHAPTER XXII.—IN THE GLOAMING.

Algernon Lord Gillingham had been baffled once in his intention respecting Nina, he was by no means cast down. He attributed his ill-luck entirely to the jealousy of Captain Marsh. At those obstacles and delays only added fuel to the evil passions which Lord Gillingham was profuse enough to designate love. He determined to make an effort to meet Nina alone, and that at a time when no immediate interference of her husband in her welfare could be brought to bear upon her.

One of his lordship's grooms had a leaning towards a certain maid at Beechwood, who was more tender than discreet. The indiscretion of this same maid had, unconsciously to herself, served the evil enemy a good turn, and it came in useful again on the present occasion. Caroline confided to Pierce one evening that Miss Nina was rather strange in her habits—not to say peculiar; so much so that Caroline, although noted for her discernment upon ordinary occasions, could really make nothing of her.

We may suppose that Pierce's curiosity was piqued by this avowal, and he questioned Caroline rather closely as to the nature of her young mistress's peculiarities. Caroline was a true woman, and, having given her heart to Pierce without reservation, it appeared natural to her that she should do likewise by her confidence—on the same terms. So she innocently informed him that Miss Nina's strangeness consisted in her fancy for walking out in unseasonable hours.

"Indeed," added Caroline, "if it's only between ourselves, I must say it would be more natural if Miss Nina was to stay by her mother's side in the drawing-room after dinner, instead of going about the grounds at such odd-of-the-way times. Not that I mean to say I suspect anything in it, but then," concluded Caroline, modestly mindful of the advantages of male escort, "not having anybody to mind, if can't be say nice, to say the least of it."

Pierce treacherously garnered up this knowledge in his heart, and communicated it to his master when he visited the stables next morning.

"At what time do they dine at Mr. Marsh's when they are alone?" enquired his lordship, looking well pleased at Pierce's information.

"At seven o'clock to a minute, my lord, because Caroline said—"

"Never mind what Caroline said now," interrupted his lordship. "I never doubted that she was a very clever young woman, and I wouldn't be right if we to encroach on a confidence which was, no doubt, intended for your ear alone."

And the earl, as if overtaken with tardy scruples, put a peg to his conversation and left Lady Gillingham's. But that evening Lord Gillingham dined earlier than usual, and, after drinking but moderately, strolled slowly down the avenue. He entered the park by a small side gate, not caring to be seen by the lodge-keeper, and reached the shrubberies at a halfpast eight, when Nina might be expected to leave the house. A rustic arbor near at hand accommodated him with a seat, and from there he could easily see the entire drawing-room of the manor-house and the long level sweep of the green lawn. He waited patiently for about a quarter of an hour; then he began to fear lest Nina should not come at all, or at least, on such a fine her ramble to the terraces, where he would not dare intrude.

But presently he saw a dark figure issue quickly through the huge doorway of the house, and move swiftly towards him. She stopped to gather a white rose from a tree in the lawn, pause it to catch the perfume; then she came on again until she was within a few paces of his hiding-place. He had no doubt now that it was the person he sought.

Nina looked very pale, and her eyes seemed to burn out of her white face with almost supernatural brilliancy. Her deep mourning dress added to her strange pallor, and gave to her form a shadowy thinness which was almost ghost-like. She stood a while motionless, looking up at the soft freshness of the evening air. The birds were chanting a dreamy lullaby, and here and there a silver star peeped out from the dark blue-grey heavens. There was a solemn hush over the distant hills, which mingled their gray peaks with the clouds until you could hardly tell where a part. A flush of crimson just lightened the western horizon. The moths came to sip the dew, and the bats whirled about in their mazy, fantastic circles, almost fanning Nina's cheek as they passed, the chasing each other with grim gaiety around and round the air. A mane-deer came from the dark, frowned glant-like into the face of the quiet sky, and assumed a sort of statuesque beauty in the gloom which destroyed a multitude of sharp-cut defects, and gave them a grand charm of their own. But Nina was aroused from her reverie by a rude voice that jarred upon her ear, and brought her back, by a sudden spring, to the hard realities of life.

She turned about with a startled cry parting her lips, and came face to face with Lord Gillingham.

"Oh, no, no! don't speak to me now!" she exclaimed with a wild piteousness of entreaty that the earl had all himself to expect from a young lady born in such matter-of-fact, mechanical times as our own. "I can't hear you to-night; it would be a shame and a desecration."

"What would?" inquired the earl a little roughly.

How was he to understand the wrestling of a spirit such as here? How could he tell that to listen to his horrible love-making seemed to Nina wicked and shameful in this pure moonlit hour? To him this poor, wild girl, struggling hopelessly against a most pitiless fate, was a mere enigma he did not care to solve. She was recovering away from him, with her dim white face upturned, her dry eyes full of piteous appeal, and he helped out this forced silence when he was meant for his profit. He grasped tight hold of both the nerveless hands and drew her, helpless, into his arms, and then he kissed her. She slunderered at violently that the rose in her hand fell from its shelter and fluttered to the ground. The caullosed the hold of her at this, picked up the flower and stood it thoughtfully in his buttonhole, wearing it as a badge of victory.

Nina had grown calmer now, and when Lord Gillingham pushed her in gentle fun to his side, she answered him quietly enough that she should require a day to consider his proposal. But as to wonderful as her self-possession unconsciously, that even a very gallant man might have considered himself permitted to hope. So confident was she earl indeed, that he would have kissed her again to seal their engagement, had she not resisted him with a determination he thought it best to respect. Then the earl went away well pleased with his interview, begging that she would give him her final answer at that time to-morrow night. After Lord Gillingham had left her Nina felt more than ever unwilling to re-enter the house.

She believed that Cyril's keen eye would read her thoughts and betray both their and glances. He and Mr. Marsh generally sat a good while over their wine, not drinking much, but talking a great deal. Still it was now close upon nine o'clock, and by this time Cyril would certainly be in the drawing-room; and it was Cyril, above all others, whom she dreaded to meet, knowing that the trouble and misery written on her face would be to him clear evidence of the truth. She turned towards the shrubberies, meaning to walk there until she was calmer, and better able to confront her cousin's sharp glance of inquiry. She had reached the small ornamental gate, which shut out the shrubberies from the park, when she came full upon Jack Dawes, leaning against the hedge in a forlorn and disconsolate attitude. Jack's face brightened immediately when he caught sight of Nina, and his lips parted in an eager effort to speak—too eager, it seemed, for Jack remained speechless. At last he blurted out, vehemently:

"Don't do that, Miss Nina—don't do that!"

"What, Jack? Tell me what I am not to do?" answered Nina, kindly, but in a tone of some perplexity.

"Don't marry him, Miss Nina, that's what I mean. For I know you're not what men are so well as we do; it isn't natural you should, not being brought into the way of 'em as we are. But I can tell you, Miss Nina, that Lord Gillingham is a regular bad lot, and I'd rather see anybody I loved in that grave than married to him; I don't think hard of me, Miss Nina, but I really would. I'm only saying—don't be angry—but a man who bullies his servants and every one else about him will soon learn to bully his wife, you he will, mark my words, Miss Nina."

"But who told you I was going to marry Lord Gillingham?" said Nina.

"No one told me, miss, no; I was taking a stroll this evening, I saw him creeping and skulking about the place, and knew directly he wasn't up to any good. So I thought I would wait about and see how long he was going to remain, and be opened the gate here and went in, as cool as may be, and then I knew that you'd let him come."

"But I hadn't, I assure you; such surprised to see him as you could have been."

"Then how dared he make so free?" exclaimed Jack, heredly. "But I'd known he hadn't an invite! I'd have knocked him down before he'd got this gate open; but I fancied for certain, seeing him in bold and confident, that you had let him come. Now, Miss Nina, I'll tell you what sort of a man he is. I don't care to repeat such tales as a rule, but perhaps it's right you should hear the whole truth. You know Rose Woodman, don't you?"

"Yes, very well. She was a pupil of mine at the Sunday-school."

"Well, it seems she caught my lord's eye one day when he was walking through the village, and he wrote straight off to Rose's mother, and the whole lot of work to be done, and then told Woodman to bring his eldest daughter to Beechwood. Count on Sunday, and be about to be out, and the housekeeper should show them all the pictures and curiosities, and so on. Well, they went, and instead of being out, as the earl said he would, there was his lordship waiting at home on purpose, and he took Rose all over the place himself, and sent her home with a coupe of greenhouse flowers as big as my head. Well, Woodman's work was to make some new gates close to the house, and Rose used to take him his dinner. Soon the neighbors found out that the earl was in the habit of meeting Rose half-way, and walking a good bit of time with her, and one day she came out in a much fresher dress than usual, and Rose was fair, but which Dame Oldum and the rest of the world declared was his lordship's present."

Here Jack hesitated and coughed, then went on suddenly:

"And the long and short of it is, Miss Nina, that Ben went to Rose one day and threw up the engagement flat, and Rose made off, I don't nobody knows where. But when Dame Oldum went to his lordship, just to satisfy Ben, who was talking on so terrible, that he would go crazy, the earl said it was no business of anybody's where Rose was, for that he'd take care she didn't suffer."

"Poor Rose! I am very, very sorry. But are you sure all this is true?"

"Quite sure, for Seth Woodman makes a boast of the money his daughter sends him, and she gave her father the frock she got from the earl, saying that she couldn't bear the sight of it now. So you see that she can afford to be particular and change her dresses with her humors."

"All this is very sad. I wish we could do something for Rose."

"I am afraid that is impossible; but Dame Oldum says that the earl has faithfully promised to provide for the girl."

"Then there is a child?"

"No, Miss Nina," answered Jack, blushing like a maiden, "only girl—I was talking of such things to you—but there will be one some day."

"It is very, very sad," again repeated Nina, finding it hard to believe in the sudden demerale-ation of such a noble, honest, pure girl as Rose.

But she knew so cruelly and fatally herself the effects of an evil presence and ungodly persuasions, that while there was no question that she was a good deal of pity in her heart towards the poor fallen girl, who had, doubtless, been sore tempted, there was more room in her eyes for scorn as she turned towards Jack and gave him her hand.

"I must go in now," she said; "but thank you for your warning. Good-night."

"And you won't marry Lord Gillingham now?"

"I don't know—but I believe not. I must make inquiries about this matter before I can come to any decision. But, at any rate, thank you for your kind intentions."

Kind intentions aren't much to signify, if they don't go no further. I'd rather do you a little more than thank-you, Miss Nina, I can tell you."

"I know you are very good and kind, Jack."

"Oh, Miss Nina, I wish you wouldn't say that. But I want a word with you, if you don't mind waiting. Nan's got engaged in the hunting-field the other day; she really has, upon my honor!"

"Engaged to be married, do you mean?"

"Yes—to Sir Frank Seymour."

Here Jack paused, finding the old difficulty in explaining himself on a subject so very dear to his heart and interests.

"She really has," he repeated, as if he were unravelling a most extraordinary phenomenon. "I can't understand it myself, that I can't; and yet—"

"Indeed, why not? Miss Dawes is very handsome, and is such a splendid horsewoman."

"Yes," answered Jack, admiringly; then he went on in a tone of great humility:

"You're so very clever, Miss Nina, that perhaps you know what you're going to say. Sheriff be married in the autumn, and will go down to Leicestershire, hunting, for the honeymoon. But it can't last long, you know."

And Jack, very red and very pitiful, stood fumbling with the latch of the gate, feeling that after a great and universal fire of wrath a complete drought had supervened, and that at the very moment when he would have given anything to be eloquent, he was unaccountably perfectly what he wished to say, and resolved to spare him the pain of a second refusal. So she made a sudden excuse for leaving him, and hurried away before Jack had sufficiently disentangled his arms to put them into words.

As Miss Nina doesn't care for me, and that's a fact," said Jack, sighing, for he had seen by her manner that she perfectly understood his intention. "And it's a pity, too, for I would have tried to make her happy, and there's more in that than most people think. At any rate it can't be helped; only it's some hard, after I've given up going to London, and got to please her."

Then Jack heaved another very long sigh, and went to unloose his two setters, which he had tied with a pocket-handkerchief to the rose, lest they should scamper about over the gardens, and destroy Mrs. Marsh's flower-be s.

CHAPTER XXIII.—DAME OLDUM'S THEORIES OF RIGHT AND WRONG.

Algernon Nina had made up her mind that it would be her duty to sacrifice herself by a marriage with Lord Gillingham. She saw it always struggling with herself against it, and searching for some loophole through which she might escape from all such a repulsive and degrading alliance. And, after all, if the fancied security in this dishonoring union should prove a fallacious hope, and she should be dragged from her high estate with a terrible fall, what should she have gained by her sacrifice? There would be increased shame for herself, and those who loved her. The Countess of Gillingham would be more notorious than Nina Marsh.

She could see no way out of her wretched difficulties. All night long she tossed on a sleepless bed, and at dawn she rose and dressed herself. Only one thing she would go and see Dame Oldum before any one was about, and learn the truth of Jack Dawes's story. If it should prove to be correct, it would at least be imposed that she should marry Lord Gillingham, and therefore, the effort of a decision would be taken out of her hands. Her pride was almost too highly. No one could have less right to inquire into a man's past than she had, but she was quite justified in demanding that a person who sought her for life or should shun the contact for ever should be free in the present. There could be no accepted rivalry between herself and Rose Woodman.

Dame Oldum was not so sharply to do her justice. She had been up an hour or more when she saw Nina wearily ascend the steep hillside. The old woman met her cordially at the door, and showed Ben's breakfast a little, in order to get him away before her visitor should arrive. When Nina reached the top of the hill she found the young man lying, a bright sudden bloom dyeing her white cheeks, the dame came out, as if by accident, and looked concerned and surprised to see any one at the threshold of her door.

"Dear me! who'd have thought it?" was her first exclamation. "But come in, miss, do; Ben's gone, and I'm quite alone."

Nina passed silently in, and sank into the first seat that presented itself.

Dame Oldum gave her one keen glance of inquiry, then went bustling about the room, as if busy with her work.

"Dawes, I want to know this story about Rose Woodman. I hear such strange reports of her and Lord Gillingham."

"Didn't you know what comes of people getting in my way?" said the old woman, with a sudden bitter expression which made Nina shudder. "No house could have stung a stronger than she did, and I made a vow I'd have my revenge some day, and I have found out her. She'll never walk up that road in Beechwood again," she triumphantly concluded.

"Oh, dame! you have never been so cruel as to have shut your door on a character very far nothing?"

"That's just what I want to know. Is it true, dame?"

"It can't signify to you either way," she answered doggedly.

"You are mistaken there—it signifies to me a great deal. If I could be sure that he had been guilty of the sin imputed to him, nothing should persuade me to marry Lord Gillingham."

"I don't see she was of being so particular about such things," muttered the old woman. "I never think anything wicked until its found out, and then I make Towngas. Gentlefolks are brought up to have their way, and if they go a little wrong in getting it, why, it's no more than we can expect. There's everything in what you are taught at starting."

"You and I will never agree about such things, dame," said Nina, coldly. "Will you tell me the truth of this story I hear, and let me get away? I am afraid of being missed from home."

"And s'pose it is true?" inquired the old woman, scanning her keenly, whilst she eagerly awaited the answer.

"Then you may be quite sure that I should have nothing whatever to do with Lord Gillingham."

"Then it isn't true," answered the old woman, sharply. "Are you satisfied now?"

"No. I can't see your motive for fabricating such a cruel tale."

"Can't you?" And the old dame laughed till the tears ran down her apple-red cheeks. "Well, you have tickled me!" she added with odious familiarity. "I never expected to find you so innocent."

Nina uncovered her face, and looked straight at the dame haughtily.

"You go too far," she said. "I have warned you from the first that you might make it easier for me tell my secret than to keep it. Can't you understand how much you are injuring yourself by injuring me?"

"I don't know about that. They'd pay me well for witnessing, no doubt."

Nina shuddered, and grew white to her lips.

"Yes, I suppose you would get something for that," she answered hoarsely, "but not nearly so much as you got out of me. It takes more than three-parts of my allowance to satisfy your claims."

"And if people have got secrets they must pay for them," replied the old woman, insolently. "I don't expect people to do anything for me out of love, and I don't see why you should—not a woman leastways. When I was young and bonny, and had men to deal with, I used to pay some of my debts with kisses instead of money; but I didn't find any women to let me off so light—nor more will you; it isn't nature. Did the captain tell you what a good match he found?" she added presently, with a malicious chuckle. "He came up here blustering and looking fierce, but he went down again as meek as a lamb. That merriner frock settled him. I saw him tugging at his beard all the way down the hill, and it's my belief he'd have liked to tug at me instead; but I'm not gamboozled so easy as that. He'll behave hisself more seemingly the next time he comes."

"Dame, I would rather you speak against me than against Captain Marsh," said Nina, sadly. "He is the best friend I have in the world."

"Then keep him as a friend; his lordship is the only safe husband for you."

"I don't know; they tell me that poor Rose will have a child."

"And what then? You aren't getting particular now, I should think? A gentleman's none the worse for liking to look at a pretty face when he can get the chance."

"But, dame, you don't understand—"

"Yes, I do," answered the old woman, with the coldest insolence. "I understand that if my lord was such a saint, he wouldn't be fit for you."

"Dame," said Nina, shuddering, "you know I never did that guiltily. It was too terrible—too terrible; it has darkened my life and made me miserable in a way you could never realise; but I swear before God that it was done innocently."

"You won't find any one to believe you."

"No, I dare say not. I have felt that all along. But it is some relief to my conscience to know that, great as my sin, great as my trouble was, that thought never came into my head. I would have faced everything—I meant to do so, but, dame, you are so cruel to make me talk about all this! You must see it kills me."

Nina sobbed convulsively, without shedding any tears. A ring of flame seemed to encircle her eyes, burning up the tears as they tried to pass. To be in the power of a coarse, merciless, hard-natured old woman like Dame Oldum sharpened all her sufferings into intense poignancy. The old prayer for death was on her lips, and in her heart, as she walked slowly down the hill, her white, despairing face flooded by the amber and purple glory of the rich sunrise.

She crept round the hill, and sat down out of the sight of all human eyes, only in God's presence. And then she prayed in repentance and supplication. She mourned bitterly over her sins, and she asked God, humbly, that, if it should please Him, she might be allowed some rest from her great sorrow.

How passionately the poor child wept and prayed on the quiet hill-side that fresh early morning! It seemed to her that she could reach God better here than in her own room.

She got up from her green couch, and began to walk homeward at a quick pace. She had girded on a shirt of mail, and Dame Oldum's taunts would have hounded off harmless had they been launched at her now. She reached the base of the hill, and was just turning into the village, when she came suddenly upon Captain Marsh and Gabrielle de Pène. There must have been some change in her face—a reflex of her inward feeling—for both stared at her: one anxiously, the other carelessly.

"You look like your old self again to-day," said Gabrielle, presently, nearly choking Nina with her white winding arms. "I wanted to scold you for running away and making us so afraid, but I can't, for I am so glad to see you with a quiet, calm look in your eyes once more. Do you know that they have been so wild and searching for months now, that I could never dare think of you? It always made me cry. But you are going to be happy again now, Nina?"

"I shall be different, I think," she answered almost solemnly. "It is not possible that I should ever be what you call happy again, but I shall be contented and calm. I am able now to leave everything in God's hands, and submit myself entirely to Him. Whatever may come to me I shall meet it steadily, and that is all I or any one else can expect."

"How strangely you talk!" exclaimed Gabrielle in a perplexed tone. "Captain Marsh, will you make Nina explain her strange conduct? I feel so curious."

But as Gabrielle did not wait for an answer, and Cyril would not heed her commands, Nina escaped free of any inconvenient questionings, and entered the house without having been forced to betray the secret of her morning's walk.

AMONG THE REEDS.

The streamlet leapt from rock to rock,
And danced adown the shallows,
To where the white pool mirrored all
The skimmings of the swallows.

Afar it heard the village hum—
The sound of human voices;
And thus it loudly, gaily sung
Mid all its myriad noises:

"Now I shall see the children play,
And hear their laughter ringing:
And I shall listen at the door
Where maids and youths are singing;

"Now I shall hear the old men tell
The young ones pretty fables,
While the red sun falls athwart
The westward-watching gables;

"And I shall swiftly rush and fling
Abroad my dancing billows;
But linger by the haunts of men,
Beside the drooping willows!"

Down by the reeds the streamlet came,
Its laughter slowly dying:
A something white—a curve of gold—
Within the pool were lying.

The streamlet paused and looked askance
Among the reeds low-laden—
The curve of gold was floating hair,
The white, a dress of maiden,

Oh, swiftly, swiftly ran the stream,
Until it grew a river!—
One hurried glance, along its course,
It darted backward never.

A fearful sound was in its ear—
A moan of maiden dying;
And through the night it heard with dread
The willows' dark leaves sighing,

Oh, swiftly, swiftly, ran the stream,
Looking behind it never;
Men knew not where the mirth had gone
Of this brown-rushing river.

JEFFERSON DAVIS'S MACON SPEECH.

When the speech delivered by the rebel President at Macon was first published, the amazement was so general that few credited its authenticity. Gradually, however, confirmation came strong and irresistible. To give it full weight as one of the most important documents of the war, we have illustrated it in the present paper.

The application of the different extracts marked below in italics and illustrated by us requires no comment. His admissions of defeat, of loss and armies melting away, cannot be retrieved by his mild calls on the women, the old men and the boys, to use their endeavors to help the falling fortunes of the rebellion:

Ladies and Gentlemen, Friends and Fellow-Citizens—It would have gladdened my heart to have met you in prosperity instead of adversity. But friends are drawn together in adversity. The son of a Georgian, who fought through the first Revolution, I would be untrue to myself if I should forget the State in her day of peril. What though misfortune has befallen our arms from Decatur to Jonesboro, our cause is not lost. Sherman cannot keep up his long line of communication, and retreat sooner or later he must; and when that day comes, the fate that befel the army of the French empire in its retreat from Moscow will be reacted. Our cavalry and our people will harass and destroy his army as did the Cossacks that of Napoleon; and the Yankee General, like him, will escape with only a body guard. How can this be the most speedily effected? By the absentees of Hood's army returning to their posts; and will they not? Can they see the banished exiles; can they hear the wail of their suffering countrywomen and children and not come? By what influences they are made to stay away it is not necessary to speak. If there is one who will stay away at this hour he is unworthy of the name of Georgian.

To the women no appeal is necessary. They are like the Spartan mothers of old. I know of one who has lost all her sons, except one of eight years. She wrote that she wanted me to reserve a place for him in the ranks. The venerable Gen. Polk, to whom I read the letter, knew that woman well, and said it was characteristic of her; but I will not weary you by turning aside to relate the various incidents of giving up the last son to the cause of our country known to me. Wherever we go we find the hearts and hands of our noble women enlisted. They are seen wherever the eye may fall or the step turn. They have one duty to perform—to buoy up the hearts of our people. I know the deep disgrace felt by Georgia at our army falling back from Dalton to the interior of the State. But I was not of those who considered Atlanta lost when our army crossed the Chattahoochee. I resolved that it should not, and I then put a man in command who I knew would strike a manly blow for the city, and many a Yankee's blood was made to nourish the soil before the prize was won.

It does not become us to revert to disaster. Let the dead bury the dead. Let us, with one arm and one effort, endeavor to crush Sherman. I am going to the army to confer with our Generals. The end must be the defeat of our enemy. It has been said that I abandoned Georgia to her fate. Shame upon such falsehood. Where could the author have been when Walker, when Pope and when Gen. Stephen D. Lee were sent to her assistance? Miserable man! The man who uttered this was a scoundrel! He was not a man to save our country. If I knew that a General did not possess the right qualities to command would I not be wrong if he was not removed? Why, when our army was falling back from Northern Georgia, I even heard that I had sent Bragg with pontons to cross it to Cuba. But we must be charitable. The man who can speculate ought to be made to take up his musket. When the war is over, and our independence won—and we will establish our independence—who will be our aristocracy? I hope the limping soldier. To the young ladies I would say that when choosing between an empty sleeve and the man who had remained at home and grown rich, always take the empty sleeve.

Let the old men remain at home and make bread. But should they know of any young man keeping away from the service, who cannot be made to go any other way, let them write to the Executive. I read all letters sent me by the people, but have not the time to reply to them. You have not many men between 18 and 45 left. The boys, God bless the boys, are, as rapidly as they become old enough, going to the field. The city of Macon is filled with stores, sick and wounded. It must not be abandoned, when threatened; but when the enemy come, instead of calling upon Hood's army for defence, the old men must fight, and when the enemy is driven beyond Chattanooga, they too can join in the general rejoicing. Your prisoners are kept as a sort of Yankee capital. I have heard that one of their Generals said that their exchange would defeat Sherman. I have tried every means, conceded everything to effect an exchange, but to no purpose. Butler, the Beast, with whom no Commissioner of Exchange would hold intercourse, had published in the newspapers that if we would consent to the exchange of negroes all difficulties might be removed. This is reported as an effort of his to get himself whitewashed, by holding intercourse. If an exchange could be effected, I don't know but I might be induced to recognise Butler. But in the future every effort will be given, as far as possible, to effect the end. We want our soldiers in the field, and we want the sick and wounded to return home. It is not proper for me to speak of the number of men in the field, but this I will say: that two-thirds of our men are absent—some sick, some wounded, but most of them absent without leave!

The man who repents and goes back to his commander voluntarily appeals strongly to executive clemency. But suppose he stays away until the war is over, and his comrades return home, and when every man's history will be told, where will he shield himself? It is upon these reflections that I rely to make men return to their duty; but, after conferring with our Generals at headquarters, if there be any other remedy it shall be applied. I love my friends and I forgive my enemies. I have been asked to send reinforcements from Virginia to Georgia. In Virginia the disparity in numbers is just as great as it is in Georgia. Then I have been asked why the army sent to the Shenandoah valley was not sent here. It was because an army of the enemy had penetrated that valley to the very gates of Lynchburg, and Gen. Early was sent to drive them back. This he not only successfully did, but, crossing the Potomac, came well nigh capturing Washington itself, and forced Grant to send two corps of his army to protect it. This the enemy denominated a raid.

What would prevent them now if Early were withdrawn from taking Lynchburg, and putting a complete cordon of men around Richmond? I counselled with that great and grave soldier Gen. Lee upon all these points. My mind roamed over the whole field. With this we can succeed. If one-half the men now absent without leave will return to duty we can defeat the enemy. With that hope I am going to the front. I may not realise this hope; but I know there are men there who have looked death in the face too often to despond now. Let no one despond. Let no one distrust; and remember that if genius is the beau ideal, hope is the reality.

MAJ.-GEN. JOHN A. LOGAN.

Origin of the War Song of the Logan Division.

The following interesting account of the origin, or rather the circumstance which called forth the well-known song, "The Bonny Free Flag," given by the brave and talented author, Major W. C. Carroll, in a letter to the publishers, Messrs. Endres & Compton, of St. Louis, will be read with pleasure by the thousands of admirers of the gallant Logan:

"A few days before the evacuation of Corinth, in May, 1862, Gen. Halleck ordered that an advance be made by our whole line, 'with a view of attacking Corinth.' Logan's brigade held the post of honor on the extreme right of the line, and swung around to the left until we came in sight of the railroad and the outer line of the enemy's works. Our skirmishers became very hotly engaged, and the main body of Logan's troops were drawn up in line of battle, awaiting the momentarily expected command to advance, when the General came dashing down the line, full of fire and animation, crying out in his musical but penetrating voice: 'Now, boys, for it! Give them jessy! Show them the best blood of Egypt!' (his brigade being mostly from Southern Illinois), and although without orders from his superior officer, gave the order to advance. Turning to his Staff, he said: 'Now, I want all of you, my aids and orderlies, to follow me!' and dashed off to the right, followed by his staff—mounted the railroad embankment in a storm of bullets, one of them cutting off the end of the General's moustache. The advance was, however, checked by the division commander, and a general engagement prevented, much to the chagrin of Gen. Logan and his brave troops."

The following are the words of the song inspired by this incident. It is a very popular song in the army:

THE BONNY FREE FLAG.

Dedicated to Major-Gen. John A. Logan, by Major William C. Carroll, 13th Illinois cavalry.

The war-cry is up, our nation resounds,
And our arms are all shining and bright;
Right bold are the foes that encircle around
The temple of our liberty's light.
But there's virtue and faith in the land of the free,
Whilst the spirit of our fathers remain,
And the bullet and sword our last refuge shall be,
Our lost States from rebellion to reclaim.

CHORUS.

Then a song and a cheer for the bonny free flag,
With its stars and its stripes waving high;
For its soldiers and sailors, its army and navy,
For our Union must live, or we'll die.

Come forth, noble youths, come forth men of nerve,
And pledge her your arms, strong and true;
Your country now calls on her faithful to serve,
For the honor of the Red, White and Blue.
Our forefathers fought for their liberty and God,
Transmitting these gems to our hands;
Then rally, my braves, better sleep neath the sod,
Than to yield up to treacherous bands.

"March on!" cried Logan," "sound the drum and the fife,
Show the best blood of freemen on the field;
Strike, strike for your homes and a dear nation's life,
For the Army of the West shall never yield.
'Tis not for the North, the East or the West,
But the South shall be equally free,
So together we'll live as the wise and the best,
And the envy of the world we will be."

Silkworms.—A new silkworm from South America is described by M. Guérin Méneville, in a letter read at a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences, at Paris. The worm was found in very great abundance, in a wild state, on the lands of the Correntino Mission, on the right bank of the Uruguay, by MM. Herrera and Fauvety. The tree on which this worm feeds is a species of mimosa; the cocoons are of an orange color when fresh, but become pale through the action of the sun and rain, and the silk produced is very fine. Specimens were submitted to the examination of the Academy. The name proposed is Ver à soie Uragayo—Bombyx Fauvetyi. M. Guérin Méneville announced the opening of one of the 16 cocoons of the Bombyx Atlas, sent to him by Capt. Hutton, from Mussoree, situated on an elevated plateau of the Himalayas. This cocoon is very large, weighing nine grammes, while the cocoons of the common worms and the ailanthus weigh only two. The lateness of the season at which this opening of the cocoon takes place will, it is feared, prevent the acclimatization of the Bombyx Atlas in France.

A gentleman recently entered a London fashionable church, where the female pew-opener expects gratuities. Twiddling a half-crown between finger and thumb, he was politely shown into a pew, and then dexterously conveyed a halfpenny into the expectant palm of his conductor, who clutched the coin and smirkingly withdrew. Presently the woman brought him a hymnbook, and, still smirking, whispered:

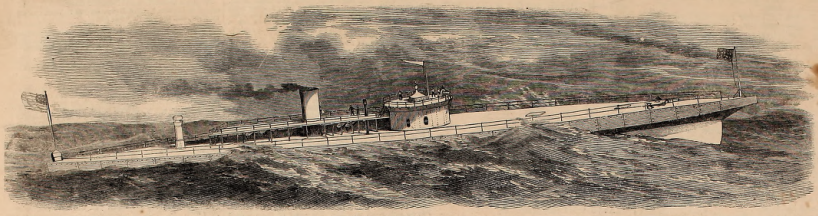
"You made a mistake, sir; it was only a halfpenny you gave me."

"No," said the gentleman, with a benevolent smile, "it's all right; I never give less."

Exit pew-opener, not smirking this time.

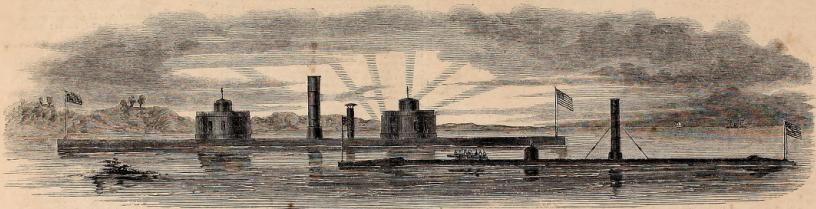
A traveller called at the Castle Tavern, Marlborough, and ordered them to get him a dinner worth his money. The landlord, thinking he would be a profitable customer, set before him a most excellent repast, consisting of all the delicacies of the season, to which the traveller did ample justice. When he had finished, the landlord presented his "little bill," and his guest tendered him a sixpence.

"How is this?" asked the host; "your dinner comes to 15s. 9d."



"Not so," answered the other; "I expressly ordered a dinner worth my money, and I assure you this sixpence is all the money I have in the world."

The landlord, finding that he was victimised, thought it was useless to argue the matter any further, and consented to be the loser on one condition—that the guest should go and cheat the landlord of the Red Lion (his enemy) of a dinner likewise.



"My good man," said the other, "I cheated him of a breakfast this morning, and he gave me 5s. to pay you a visit!"

"Massa," said the black steward to his captain, as they fell in with a homebound vessel, "I wish you would write a few lines for me to de ole woman, 'cause I can't write." THE CAMPAIGN IN GEORGIA—A BAGGAGE TRAIN CROSSING THE MOUNTAINS IN A STORM.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, C. E. F. HILLEN.

OUR NEW IRONCLADS.

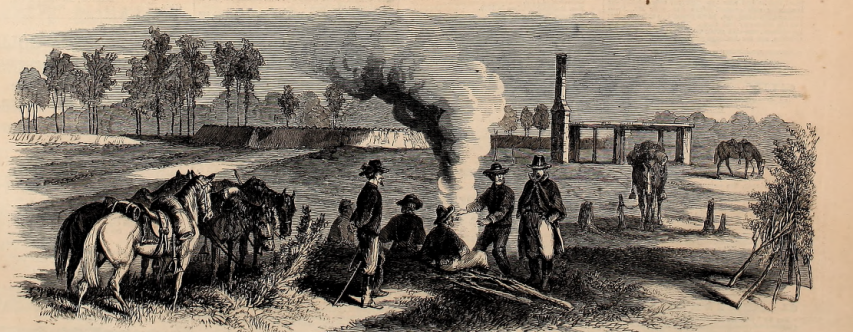
On page 108 will be found truthful sketches of a new batch of machines of war belonging to our navy. The Dictator is represented at sea and in the act of lifting her enormous prow from the briny deep over which she is cornsing. She is known as an ocean ironclad ram, and was built at the Delamater iron works foot of 13th street, N. R., from plans and drawings by the great Swedish engineer, John Ericsson. She is a beautiful piece of workmanship, She carries two 15-inch guns in her turret.

The Monadnock, although a monitor battery, is built of oak wood, and heavily clad with iron armor. She has two turrets, and carries four 15-inch guns. She was built at the Boston Navy Yard, under the superintendance of W. L. Hanscomb, Esq., naval constructor.

The Tunxis belongs to the light draught monitor class of vessels which have been so unsuccessful. In is doubtful whether she can ever be made useful in her present condition. She was built at Chester, Penn., by Cheney, Son & Archbald, from plans and drawings of Chief-Engineer Alban C. Stimers, U. S. N. She carries two 11-inch guns in her turret.

The Naga is also a light draught monitor, but she will be completed without a turret and will mount an 11-inch gun on her forward deck. The pilot-house will take the place of the turret. She was built at Wilmington, Delaware, from plans by Mr. Stimers.

The new torpedo boat bears the name of Stromboli, and is the invention of Chief-Engineer W. W. W. Wood, U. S. N. We are not at liberty at the present time to go into an internal description of this new and novel craft. She performs her work entirely with the torpedo, which, by an ingenious contrivance, is placed and exploded under the bottom of an enemy's vessel, or on the bed of a river or bay where obstructions have been placed. She was built at Fair Haven, Conn., by S. H. Pook, Esq., one of the most accomplished and successful naval architects of the age. He is a son of naval constructor S. M. Pook.



The little picket boats which we represent are new to our service, and their value cannot at the present time be over-estimated. All of them are fitted with a "Wood" torpedo attachment. There are six of them already constructed. They were built at Schenectady, N. Y., under the superintendence of Capt. C. S. Boggs, of Varuna fame.

THE LATE MYSTERIOUS MURDER.

A GREAT city is ever the scene of fearful crimes. The immense mass of people, the constant changes, the dens and sloughs of vice, all give a sort of cover to crime. Occasionally a case occurs in which murder is attended with such revolting circumstances as to cause a thrill through a community hardened to such scenes. Such was the case of Colt, who packed the body of his victim, Adams, in a box with salt, and shipped it on board a vessel bound for New Orleans, and directed to some point on the Mississippi river, where, had it arrived, detection would have been almost impossible. But by the acuteness of the detectives the box was traced from Colt's room to the ship, by means of the cartman, and the crime was thus exposed. So in the case of Professor Webster; his attempt to burn the body of Parkman in his laboratory led to the discovery of the murder.

In our vicinity recently there has been a very remarkable case of this kind, involved, perhaps, in more mystery and certainly more curious in its details than usually surround the most mysterious murders.

On the 3d of October a boatman near the foot of Little street, Brooklyn, saw a package floating on the water, and thinking it might contain clothing or something of

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported Liquors, and when domestic compounds purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are forced upon the world as "unerring remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known then, that while all the deleterious stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing Alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing more or less oil, a mineral poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essences with the purest juices of the most valuable stomachic, anti-bilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia, and all the kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. He asks but day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Bitters advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every respectable calling and walk of life. FRANK LESLIE'S
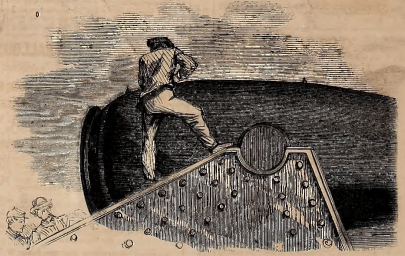
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 476—Vol. XIX.] NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 12, 1864. [PRICE 10 CENTS $4 00 YEARLY, 13 WEEKS $1 00.

Judah P. Benjamin on our National Finances.

Once upon a time there was a little enterprising Jew of the Island of Barbadoes, who crossed over to the State of Louisiana, settled there, entered into the practice of the law and the politics of the Democratic party, and became a great man. As a lawyer he made money, as a politician he made heaps of money; but from the Southern games of bluff and faro, it is said that this prosperous individual, like the notorious Slidell, realised the bulk of his riches in houses, lands and negroes. At the time of the so-called secession of Louisiana in 1861 these two remarkable men, John Slidell and Judah Peter Benjamin, were the representatives of said State in the Senate of the United States, and in this capacity had been doing a good business in Houmas land speculations, swamp land grants, and other bills ceding away the public domain to States and companies.



PLACING THE GUN IN POSITION, AFTER THE FIRST DISCHARGE.

Under that delectable Southern millenium established in the name of Jeff Davis, Slidell has figured as his ambassador to Louis Napoleon, while Benjamin has held, and now holds the unprofitable sinecure of Secretary of State of the Confederacy. Slidell is out on charm's way, and has made ample provision for his family in Europe, whatever may be the fate of poor Jeff. His old colleague, Benjamin, is in a somewhat critical situation at Richmond; but it is believed that he, too, has laid something by for a rainy day on the other side of Jordan or the Atlantic, and expects, in the last extremity, to reach it by running the blockade after the fashion of Mason and Slidell.

In the meantime, having nothing better to do in his capacity of Premier to Jeff Davis, the indefatigable Benjamin, true to the peculiar instinct of his industrious race, has turned his attention to a little financiering. Some six or seven years ago, as many of our readers will remember,

LOADING THE GUN WITH A 1080 POUND SHOT BY MEANS OF A DERRICK.

THE BREECH—ADJUSTING THE PRIMER.

FIRING THE FIRST SHOT.

THE GREATEST GUN IN THE WORLD—ITS TRIAL AT FORT HAMILTON, N. Y., OCT. 26.

there was Southern speculator of the name of A. Dudley Mann, who tried the experiment of establishing a numerous fleet of large steamers for direct trade between some Southern ports and Europe, but failed to raise among all the cotton lords of all the South the money necessary to build the first ship. They found it cheaper to trade with Europe by way of New York. This man, Mann, since the setting up of the Davis Confederacy, has been the planner of King Cotton and King Slavery, has been dabbling in Europe in Confederate buccaneering cruisers and blockade-runners. A. Dudley Mann, therefore, is the man to whom Benjamin from Richmond addresses himself as the proper man through whom to enlighten the capitalists of the European continent in reference to his rather fully investing in the Government securities of the United States. John Bull, following his sympathies for King Cotton, has made, in various contraband advventures, heavy investments, in support of the protegé Jeff Davis, and has already realised the truth of the old proverb, to the effect of many millions of dollars, that "a fool and his money are soon parted." Not so with the sagacious and cool-headed people of the German States. They, pretty clearly comprehending the issue of this war, have been and still are investing liberally in the bonds of our National treasury. To stop this leaning, and to weaken our national cause in Europe on the money question, Benjamin makes up his budget for European circulation. It is needless here to enter into his tables of figures of our National debt, state debts, daily expenses of the war, conscription expenses, etc. It will suffice to give the conclusions at which he arrives. His figures, derived mostly from official reports, are mainly correct, but his conclusions are exceedingly fallacious.

Benjamin says that the "facts thus presented demonstrate that if the United States persist, as is now threatened, in carrying on the war for another year, the burden of their public debt will be such as to render it absolutely impossible for them to pay." He argues from this that "if the capitalists of Europe withhold further supplies, the resources of the United States are so far exhausted as to render the restoration of peace certain at no distant day;" but, he continues, "it is in the power of the same capitalists, by furnishing the means for the gratification of the insane passions of the North, to plunge the borrowers into irretrievable bankruptcy, and to render certain the loss of all their own investments, past as well as future."

Now, for the sake of shortening the argument, we will waive his rebel financier's and his own absurd assumption that the United States cannot sustain the accumulation of another year's expenses of this war to our national debt. What, then, Benjamin? Why, there is no probability that the rebellion will or can hold out another year, or even six months longer. From the immense strides accomplished towards its subjugation, even considering the diminished forces, the contracted area, and the exhausted condition to which the armies of Davis have been reduced, and our own greatly increased and still increasing strength and concentration of the armies and fleets of the Union, we have every reason to expect that within one month after our Presidential election this war will be at an end, with the collapse of the Southern Confederacy. Its strength is now, we may say, reduced to the shattered and depleted army of Lee, for the feeble garrison of Mobile, in Georgia, is a fugitive, vainly endeavoring to escape by the running columns of Sherman. If a decisive military issue at Richmond, before the expiration of the month of November shall not utterly extinguish this rebel theory of Benjamin and Benjamin, we shall, perhaps, be ready to admit that there is some degree of plausibility in his dismal calculations.

Within six months from this time, we venture to say, that every capitalist or politician in Europe will be prepared to accept these conclusions, to wit: that before the end of another year this war and two-thirds of its expenses will be ended, and the resources of the rebel United States, cotton and all, will be added to the available wealth of the Union. It is, we dare say, some such estimate as this that has for some time past been operating on the European Continent, and that still increases in strength, in favor of investments in our national securities. Against the false theory of Jeff Davis on the military situation, the new position in the South in favor of that last desperate experiment of arming their slaves to fight for slavery, and our late progressive victories in the field, East and West, the exhibit of the relative futurity of State of the exhausted condition of our national treasury will be rightly understood in Europe. While writing this exhibit of our financial weakness to A. Dudley Mann, it is very probable that Master Benjamin had his messenger out in the streets of Richmond, vainly endeavoring to make financial speculation at the rate of $1,000 in Confederate scrip for a $10 bill bearing the portrait of Abraham Lincoln!

Summary of the Week.

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

On Thursday, Oct. 27, reconnoissances, in force, for the purpose of ascertaining the enemy's position and strength, and also to invite an attack, were made on the two extremes of our lines around Richmond and Petersburg.

On the left the 2d and 5th corps were pushed out to the Boydton road, used by the rebels to convey their supplies from that portion of the Weldon railroad held by Grant.

At every point, strong entrenchments, well manned, were found.

After the 2d corps, Gen. Hancock, had held the position some time, he was furiously attacked by the enemy, who were repulsed, with the loss of 900 rebels as prisoners.

Gen. Grant estimates our loss at 200. Having accomplished his object, Gen. Hunter returned to his former position.

On the north side of the James, Gen. Butler extended his reconnoissance as far as the Yorktown road, but found every thing quiet.

ON THE UPPER POTOMAC.

A dispatch from Gen. Kelley, dated at Cumberland, Md., states that a detachment of the 8th Ohio cavalry was attacked on last Saturday morning by 800 of the rebel Imboden's men, under Major Hill, who, after two hours of hard fighting were repulsed and routed, with a loss of 8 prisoners, 15 killed and a large number wounded. Major Hill was mortally wounded and captured. The Union loss was seven killed and 21 wounded. The location of the fight is not given.

SHENANDOAH VALLEY.

Although the rebel army has been entirely demoralised and much broken, there is still located over the valley a considerable body of them. It is well known that they have a large body of cavalry in Luray valley, and to ascertain their precise strength a reconnoitring party of 300 cavalry, under Major Gibson, was sent on the 24th of October. This force came upon a large body of rebel cavalry, who, although much superior in numbers, held in disorder to their entrenchments. Major Gibson, not deeming himself sufficiently strong to attack these, then returned to camp, having captured a battle flag and some prisoners.

The guerillas are still very troublesome, and rob and murder with impunity. They attacked a Union train near our front on the 26th, but were soon driven off.

MISSOURI.

Price's rebel army suffered a very serious defeat on Sunday, 23d Oct., by the Union army, under Generals Curtis and Pleasanton, on the Western border of the State, near the south of Kansas city. They were chased all Sunday night, and on Monday they made a stand, but were again defeated. Price having crossed from Missouri into Kansas, the Union cavalry followed him, a series of fights taking place on Tuesday and Wednesday, 25th and 26th, in which the rebels suffered disastrously for the rebels, who lost 1,500 in prisoners and 12 pieces of cannon.

General Sanborn and Col Cabel were captured, with several Colonels. Price burned 200 wagons to save them from falling into our hands. Gen. Steele was in pursuit with a large force to intercept his return to Arkansas.

LOUISIANA.

Gen. Hurlbut, who commands at New Orleans, has ordered the enrolment of all males in the department between the ages of 18 and 45. The guerillas are very troublesome on the Louisiana plantations. On the night of the 15th of October they burned 2,000 bales of cotton near Baton Rouge, carrying off all the negroes they could find. Squads of rebel cavalry are scouring Iberville parish, under orders from Mr. Allen, who styles himself Governor of Louisiana.

ATLANTA.

Despatches have been received at the War Office up to the evening of the 29th October, which confirm the statement that the rebels are concentrating Tennessee. Col. Johnson, the late commander of the rebel garrison at Dalton, saw the whole of Hood's army at Palmetto town, and he estimates their numbers at 35,000.

NORTH ALABAMA.

The news is not quite certain, but it would seem that the rebel Generals Taylor and Hood have moved into North Alabama, and are about invade Middle Tennessee. Taylor, who commands the rebel army of the Gulf, has about 10,000 men, and is reported to be moving towards Selma and near Decatur. Hood's advance is said to have reached Guntersville.

EAST TENNESSEE.

Gen. Gillem met Gen. Vaughan on the 27th near Morristown, and, after a sharp encounter, routed him, taking 500 prisoners.

TOWN GOSSIP.

Potatoes is the all absorbing theme, from the bowl to the pate, now for so far the next few weeks, at the end of which time the great Presidential question will be settled, and we shall know under which administration we are to live for years to come. Then the war is nothing, and a battle a bagatelle. In fact New York is no longer enthusiastic, and has come to regard the war as merely a necessary evil which we are obliged to bear, and of which there is little hope of seeing the end. Fallen on evil times, appeals directly to their dispositions and to the pocket, and yet the whole machine is run by a few professional hands, and the general public have little real voice in the choice of their future rulers as they had in the nomination.

The present Presidential campaign puzzles the wisest old political heads. There is no basis upon which to build, and every day produces new causes for alarm. The local elections held during the past month are no criterion of the views of the people, for the ever powerful personal popularity will rule over the mere votes of the opposite party, but whether enough to elect a single candidate is a matter for prophesy.

Even while this political storm is sweeping over the country, a large portion of the people are beginning to take to work out a solution of all our troubles. We mean the efforts to form companies for oil. The Petroleum States have filled their quotas, with men provided by the Government, and the call for men in the State the quota is full, but New York city still goes on raising 4 and 5 regiments, apparently with no desire to do, against the next call, which may confidently be looked for in January.

In connection with this subject, we do not regret to see the bribery and corruption which now exists practiced by the Provost Marshals. It seems a recognised thing, that from the moment a man is drafted, and before the enlistment paper, he loses all claim to humanity, and is from thence regarded as a "substitute," a commercial bomby pumper or a deserter. We have seen a drunken man in a carriage driven to the office of one of these men, a low, poisonous cur, without a place to sit upon, or a decent coat to his back, who was duly enrolled for two days, notwithstanding they could see by his appearance that he was not fit for the Marshal as security for their not running away. Such practices are not only low and mean, but they discourage enlistments, and later men with any pride from enlisting.

Now upon this subject we should say something about the "substitute" system, which is a curse to the country, of those having charge of the granting of passes to Hoke's division, and to the Provost Marshals, of some cases amounting to 1,000 per day, have to go to Hart's Island, to the general receiving depot, from there no such thing as a furlough is granted, and as a consequence the men are obliged to take to male soldier to bid adieu to wife, mother or sister, but a female friend, or a boy. The Government has been a fine diamond running these capable of carrying out their designs, and we have no doubt that many of all those wives, mothers and sisters who entered for passes to see their friends on the Island one day, only once permitted to go daily where brimstone is applicable.

Many of the substitutes are deserters, who have been put off with a pass dated a month ahead, when the time for their return to camp would be over, and the liability of the recruit being kept there over a week, thus adding much to the profit of the Government allowed every man, woman and child to go up to the island who could get a pass, and the Provost Marshals would not interrupt the discipline of the post, if it was done under certain rules. All these things operate against recruiting, and are especially hard on the recruiting officer, who receives from his men all the abuse, which justly belongs to those high in power.

Our local war, fast between the tailors and their employers still continues, and our nice young men are becoming accustomed to all the demands of the coming season, which promises to be one of unusual gayety. We have upon a large body of rebel cavalry, who, although much superior in numbers, refused to accede the case. In the meantime the strikers are left to the protection of the constables, and just now—if they do not mount up their wrists on the principle that we believe rules a number of our other evils with a view to get the best of it.

Our other evil with war, that between the city railroads and the public, we see subsequently that is now engaged than any other, and that is something. We have succeeded in getting all our horses with a limited number of terrible undiscovered number and demonstrations, and we are now ready for the fray on all events and occasions. We are reminded of it by taking up a copy of that remarkable journal, the Sojourner, and finding there the following editorial:

VOTE MONEY OR VOTE ——.—A MORAL FOR COUNTRY MERCHANTS.

A Pittsburg merchant, and a member of the Councils of that city, was at the Astor House in New York Monday night of $4,500. He had gone there to buy goods and to "see about," while remaining in the night was some "friends." So the story is told in the newspapers. This gentleman, although no politician himself, may not be thankful that he did not lose his life in addition to his money. Let us tell the style in which they met now. He would have been much worse off if he kept a gambling house in a Broadway, New York, or in a New York dock, his arms over in Williamsburg and his head down at Governor's Island. As a long time ago the Herald had a list of battle-scarp homicides, or attempted homicides, and which it kept for years, and added to from days, and thinished that people are frequently missing that never turn up, so we have a list, of course, of late that Pittsburg merchants and all other merchants from that State shall not better go to New York to buy, and purchase their goods in Philadelphia, where we are somewhat more careful of the money and free of strangers."

Which very clearly shows in every line that neither the National rights are to be properly cared for, nothing of the word jealousy as connected with New York. The merchants of the West and Northwest will not have to come to New York, and like all other countrymen are coming, Philadelphia is the place to go to. So selected has two boom companies, possibly countrymen in the end, but all working for the city at present, and only right, want to stop in the same bed, and in the forthcoming new Pennsylvania convention we shall see 25,000, whether by robbery or by scattering it in the streets during the election, is really worse.

Of these terrible murders that are committed in our midst no record will always be kept in the newspapers of ten days are the work of some native of another country. New York, Philadelphia, Boston and the cities and scoundrels of the world, Philadelphia included. Other cities, Paris and the great centres of intelligence and the people will almost every bird in the country, and the Philadelphia merchants and legislators who look upon their visits to New York as simply a matter of business, and who are thereby supports in our midst places that the good and the and intelligent of the country would not visit, and if left to themselves, is the reason why we do not, if called to the spot, we have much chance to show.

As a singular instance of enthusiasm in the wrong place we just point to the presence of last Sabbath at the church of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. It was announced that he would preach upon the fact that the reverend gentleman was about to leave for Europe, and numerous of the upper ten Sunday evenings. It was during one of these semi-political discourses that he interrupted the name of McClellan. In a moment a cheer broke forth that shook the building, and the whole audience, followed by another and yet another. The speaker stood upon the platform, a look somewhat puzzled, and then forcing up a grim smile went on. The story has a moral, which is that the people's power in the future will break through the trammels of parties.

Another fact on the 8th of next month we are disposed to believe, is that of a vote of Alexander Dumas in the country, and the election of Lincoln by a large effect, and shall have in a month or two another literary treat.

One of the excitements just now, in a financial way, is that of gold rising. Everybody is getting excited, and every one who has $10, in some cases even less, in Government, is buying gold stock. It is a good time for the investment, without doubt, as a happy one, but between ourselves we do not believe it will go over 2 per cent. up to 10 per cent. ditto, are somewhat calculated to make a man nervous, and we have noticed that the old stocks past Wall street has doubled in petroleum to the extent of 100 per cent. within the past few days. Outside of all speculative ideas there is something wonderful in the Petroleum idea. It seems as though at the very moment when the people were to be destroyed by the scarcity of coal, Providence in the very nick of time had been the subject of the burning fluid which is to be the means of saving us. It is not to be that a new material should be discovered in such quantities as to supersede coal for all time, and that further, when cotton was lost to us a source of supply should be opened to us at the very spring to supply that wealth, bidding fair, at no distant day, to be the first in the world.

An event of the week worthy of some notice is that of the burning of the Union railroad train bound into the city, by regular and fast train, with the mails, passengers and express freight. Nearly 200 the guard were, and strange to remember, not a single life was lost. The week under the stimulus of bad country whiskey and cheap liquors, has been a fearful harvest of wakings, purses, and wherever else they fancied, and the city is in a terrible way in the street. The railroad still continuing their way towards New York with passengers, and the police fail to make arrests and punish?

Notes of the theatres:

The opera has had emphatically a week of triumphs. Carl Rosa's company, which we have spoken of in the last soon forgotten in "Dublin." Her Pauline has been a perfect success, and has enabled her to bring this opera home to the hearts of music-loving New Yorkers. Mr. Castle, as Count Stein, has had appreciative and liberal words, but this week has dawned upon a new star in the person of Miss Kellogg as Pauline, who wrote the popular operas of the day. Zuochi has great power, and Mr. Castle, with a solid voice, good and grand stage figure and youth, would make it strange indeed if he were not popular.

Through the week we are to have "Don Giovanni," with Miss Kellogg as Zerlina, and Mr. Castle, a new candidate for operatic honors as Giulio in "Rigoletto." We read how to hear with the French successes of losing Max and his company for some little time yet.

At the Winter Garden we have had a great change. Mr. Clarke, after attracting all the town for weeks in "Voodoo," "Major de Boots," and the highest of high old comedy and farce, turns right about and gives us Shakspeare, and we are glad to say that it is as well as it is possible to be with the style of acting we have to do it in. Mr. Clarke has given us Bob Tyke in "The School of Reform," and pleasures will carry it long in their memories as some of the most finished acting of the day.

The Broadway is going on night after night with Mr. John Owens, making a success that is truly flattering to the appreciative powers of a New York public. Mr. Owens's "Solon Shingle" is a piece of stagework coming nearer to nature than anything that has been seen in these localities for many years, and such as will not be seen again for many more.

Wallack gives "Rosedale" again this week for a change.

The Olympic brings out a new thing, if a translation can be called new, entitled "Marguerite's Colors," and sends "Martin Chuzzlewit" into the shades for the present.

Niblo's is making a hit with Maggie Mitchel and "Fanchon." There is something in the play that seems to come home to the audience, and this time it is better produced than it ever has been before.

Artemus Ward has opened his chapter on Mormonism at Dodworth's rooms, though why at this God-forsaken, cramped place is more than we can tell. Every night tells of its small size, and the continual turning away of hundreds at the doors admonishes him either to stretch the capacity of his room or remove his pictures to some more elastic locality. His audience have not room to laugh.

Heller has still that same troublesome "Spirit in Scarlet," and those who are inclined to a belief in the spiritual or supernatural ought to study it out.

What Barnum will do now is a marvel. The Thumbs have gone, for ever, as they declare, from the classic shades of the Museum. It will not, however, be the frequenters who will lose, for Barnum has a way of getting desperate over his losses, and upon the desertion of a giant, dwarf or any other man or thing, manages somehow to pick up something always more curious and more run-after-able.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Another proof how a love of notoriety can disturb the judgment was given last week, when a respectably-dressed young woman called at the Coroner's office, and requested to look at the fragments of the body recently found in Brooklyn. When they were shown her she instantly declared they were the remains of her husband, to whom she had been married only three days when he disappeared. When asked for her marriage certificate she produced it. Being dated four days after the first portions were found, it was of course clear she was laboring under a decided delusion.

—— An inquiry is now being held on the charges brought against Inspector Boole by Mayor Gunther.

—— It is just 27 years since the telegraph was put to practical use.

—— Pennsylvania has produced during the past year $56,000,000 worth of petroleum, and $51,000,000 of iron.

—— There are 268,079 Indians left in the United States; 25,000 Creeks, 17,350 Cherokees, 16,000 Choctaws, 15,000 Navajoes, 13,638 Sioux and 3,300 Camanches.

—— The Miners' Register, of Sept. 7th, printed at Central City, Colorado Territory, says: "The immense clouds of grasshoppers which passed over the city yesterday were a sight, we believe, has never before been witnessed in the Territory. By looking towards the sun they could be seen in a dense crowd like swarms of bees. They appeared to be coming from the western slope and going eastward to the plains. They were very high up, probably 2,000 feet, as they were flying entirely above all the mountains about here. A few straggling ones lighted here, but the vast majority of them passed over. We should expect to see everything swept before them wherever they go."

—— The poisonous character of the liquors sold at the present day was illustrated in the case of a negro who died at Philadelphia the other day of intemperance. A post-mortem examination was made, and when the abdomen was laid open it was found that, by the direct action of liquor, the membrane lining the stomach had been corroded and eaten through. The mucous membrane of the viscera was so nearly destroyed that the victim may be literally said to have been "eaten" by poison and "doctored" liquor.

—— In the case of the suppression, in 1861, of the Jeffersonian, a newspaper published at West Chester, Penn., a jury in the U. S. Circuit Court at Philadelphia has just given the plaintiff a verdict of $500.

—— A case of much interest to certain parties has been decided by Justice Boerum, in Brooklyn. It was a suit for damages to a wagon, caused by the horses running away; the vehicle had been engaged on Sunday to take a family out for a ride, the horses ran off before the party was ready, the owner sues the hiring party for the price agreed upon and the damages in addition; the defence pleads that no such bargain made on Sunday is legal—and so the court decides, under the statute prohibiting travelling for pleasure on that day.

—— A meeting was held in Hope Chapel on the 27th of all the Frenchmen residing in New York who are in favor of re-electing Mr. Lincoln. The assemblage was energetic and unanimous.

—— A terrific rainstorm swept over New York and the adjacent parts, on Friday afternoon, doing considerable damage.

—— The new line of steamers to Providence of the Neptune Steamboat Co. is now thoroughly inaugurated. The Electra is running regularly twice per week from the foot of Robinson street. Seven more are building and will be finished by the 1st of January. The Galatea, with Mr. S. C. Williams, formerly cashier of the Stonington line, as Passenger clerk, enters the line within a fortnight. Mr. Williams is eminently qualified for the post to which he has been assigned, and will, we doubt not, in his new place, win an increase of friends by his urbanity, attention to his duties and sterling integrity. The new line, under the guidance of its able directors and their agent, Mr. Wm. M. Edwards, cannot be otherwise than entirely successful, not only as a medium for the conveyance of freight, but as a first-class as well as economical means of travel for passengers. The fare for the round trip by this line, to Providence, is only $3, being much less than by any other, and with equally as elegant accommodations.

Military.—During the progress of the insidious malady which was the cause of the death of Gen. Birney, he was frequently delirious. During these moments, when reason was temporarily unseated, he constantly was under the hallucination that he was still in the field at the head of the proud legions that he had led so often to victory. He was frequently heard to exclaim by the anxious watchers at his bedside: "Bring up the guns," "Advance on the left," and other military orders, the counterpart of those issued on the battlefield. His last words, spoken in the delirium that preceded his death, were: "Boys, keep your eyes on the flag!"

—— The wrought-iron Ames gun was tried at Bridgeport, Connecticut, last week. Three shots were fired, with the following result, as reported in the Bridgeport Standard—The first shot, with a charge of 16lbs. of powder, the gun elevated at 24½ degrees, was sent 5¾ miles. The second shot, elevation the same, with a charge of 20 pounds of powder, was a "tumbler," and fell short about 1¼ miles. The third shot, with a charge of 25 pounds of powder, went a distance of 7¼ miles in 30 seconds. The shell weighed 107 pounds.

—— Gen. Butler's retaliation by putting rebel prisoners in the Dutch Gap canal, has had the desired effect. The Union soldiers are consequently not employed any longer on the rebel fortifications. This is the second time that Gen. Butler has taught the rebels a good lesson.

—— The Independence Belge, of Brussels gives the following curious particulars of the amounts received by various artists as the results of single performances: Malibran, at Drury Lane, received $750 each night; the same price was paid to Lablache for two performances: Grisi, at New York, received $2,000 for one performance, and shortly after obtained $11,000 as the result of one night's entertainment in London; Taglioni received $750 for every performance at Hamburg; at her second benefit at St. Petersburg she realised the extravagant sum of $45,000, in addition to a magnificent present of diamond ornaments made her by the Czar.

Foreign.—William Ronpell, ex M.P. and convicted forger, was to have gone out lately to New Zealand with a batch of convicts, but it is stated his stay in England is necessary in connection with the property affected by the recent forgeries. He is employed in the extension works at Chatham, and may be seen as a common laborer, dressed in a gray, coarse convict suit, using a spade or pickaxe, getting stone, or yoked with other convicts to a cart, in connection with the works for the enlargement of the Chatham Dock Yard.

—— A few weeks ago an old woman died in the small town of Lievikzee, on the banks of the Scheldt. The old lady was regarded by her neighbors as being within only a few removes from positive poverty, but she died and left no will behind her, and, to the astonishment of her neighbors, what she did leave behind her was cash, bank notes and stock, amounting in value to about 2,000,000 guilders. There were pots full of the gold and silver of withdrawn and forgotten currencies, which had been buried for years; there was a box full of Austrian and other stock certificates, the coupons of which had not been cut off for a quarter of a century; while in a tin canister, which might have been the domestic tea-caddy, was a quarter of a million's worth of banknotes, musty with the accumulated damp of years.

"Art. 7. The Marquis de Chauteaurenard, our Minister Plenipotentiary to the Prince of Hesse, is named our Envoy Extraordinary and Minister to the United States of America, in place of M. Mercier."

Despite the Southern education and marriage of Count Mercier, he has deported himself very impartially during the war.

The only difference of opinion between Mr. Douglas and Mr. Lincoln was, that Mr. Douglas was for calling out 200,000 instead of 75,000 men, and had a much clearer estimate of the intentions and strength of the rebellion than had the President. FOREIGN NEWS.

England.—Numerous failures continue to depress the commercial mind. Mr. Gladstone, in a recent speech at Ripon, again declared that, while the British Cabinet deplored the continuance of the war in America, it was their determination not to interfere; at the same time he doubted the power of the North to subjugate the South.

The report that Semmes was again afloat was denied.

The London Times has an article, in which it advocates the formation of the Canadian Confederacy as a balance to the war power of the Union.

The Mace Coburn prizefight was a draw. Coburn had claimed the stakes, but it had been decided against him, on the ground that as the objection to the referee came from himself, he had been the chief cause of the match being off.

Mexico.—Cortina has at last gone over to Maximilian. On the 26th of Sept. he surrendered Matamoras and the greater part of his troops to Gen. Meja, taking the oath of allegiance to the Empire. Gen. Canalis, with about 300 men, however, refused, and crossed over to Brownsville, Texas, surrendering themselves to Gen. Ford, who commands the rebel forces there.

THE GREAT GUN AT FORT HAMILTON.

Our first page this week is entirely occupied with illustrations of the trial of the monster gun, which was made at Fort Hamilton on the 26th of October. Fort Hamilton is on the Long Island shore, about eight miles from New York city, and almost immediately opposite Fort Lafayette. An excursion steamer from the city went thither on the day of the trial, which was bright and cheerful in autumnal beauty, and conveyed many citizens, together with military and naval officers, to witness the interesting experiment. Several hundred persons were present. Among the spectators were Capt. Rodman, the inventor of the gun—which is remarkable as the largest in the world; Mr. Knapp, the owner of the Fort Pitt foundry, at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, where the gun was cast; Capt. Wise, Chief of Ordnance Bureau, U. S. Navy; Capt. Benet, Chief of Ordnance Bureau, U. S. Army; Major S. Van Vliet, Quartermaster; Gen. Hitchcock; Gen. Howe; Capt. A. R. Buffington, U. S. Ordnance Corps, commanding the party working the gun; Capt. Marcel, of the Revenue cutter Bronx, the excursion steamer of the occasion; and Paymaster Hassler, of the receiving ship Vermont. Mr. Orison Blunt and Mr. Peter Cooper were also present. All admired the great gun. Our readers may remember that we published a picture of the casting of this huge piece of artillery, which took place on the 11th of February. The gun is made of Juniata iron, weighs nearly 1,117 pounds, and at the breach is nearly 6 feet in diameter. Its bore is 20 inches, and it carries a solid shot of 1,080 pounds weight. Its regular charge of powder is 100 pounds, but that may be increased, should necessity require, to 125, or even to 130 pounds. On the occasion of its trial, it was discharged three times.

A blank cartridge containing 100 pounds of powder, mammoth No. 1, was first fired, amid the applause of the spectators. The great gun spoke for itself, but its voice did not prove to be as loud as that of an ordinary 10-pounder Parrott, loaded with small shot. It recoiled about two feet. Our first sketch represents the operation of placing it in position, after this recoil. It was then loaded with 50 pounds of powder and a solid shot, weighing 1,080 pounds. One of our sketches represents the process of loading it by means of a derrick, which, we believe, is a novel, as it is certainly a clumsy method of filling the cannon's mouth. It occupied, on this occasion, precisely one hour. On being discharged this immense shot was driven about a quarter of a mile, when it ricochetted six or seven times, and finally disappeared in the water. The gun recoiled two feet six and a half inches. It was then loaded for the third discharge with 100 pounds of powder and a 1,080 pound shot, and pitched at an angle of 25 degrees. Especial interest was felt in the result of this trial, together with some apprehension as to its result. The gun was fired by an officer, who snapped the cap. Thereupon the ball was hurled forth about four miles in twenty-seven seconds, the gun recoiling four feet, eight and three quarter inches.

A second trial of the mammoth was made on the 27th of October, with perfectly satisfactory results.

THE ST. ALBAN'S RAID.

We devote a large space, this week, to illustrations of the recent rebel raid upon St. Alban's, Vermont. St. Albans is a flourishing town, situated three miles east of Lake Champlain, 23 miles from Rouse's Point—where the railroads converge, going North—and 10 miles from the Canada line. The raid was made upon it on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 19th Oct. Business hours had not passed and the banks were still open. The attacking party numbered 25 or 30 persons. These men had come over from Canada and quietly congregated at the various hotels in St. Albans, holding no noticeable communication and awakening no suspicion. Their plan was a bold one, and was successfully executed. On the day mentioned, at about three o'clock in the afternoon, they suddenly congregated, in squads, and made a simultaneous attack on the St. Albans, the Franklin county and the First National Banks. At each bank they drew their revolvers, threatening instant death to all the officers present if any resistance was made. They then robbed the drawers and vaults of all specie, bills and other valuable articles that they could lay their hands upon.

At the St. Albans bank these ruffians compelled the tellers to take the oath of allegiance to the Confederate Government. At the Franklin bank they thrust the cashier, Mr. Beardsley, together with a Mr. Clark, into the safe, and left them, where they must infallibly have suffocated, but for the timely arrival of assistance, after the robbers had decamped.

At the First National Bank some resistance was made to them, by Mr. Blaisdell, one of the bank officers, as represented by our Artist. But, in general, they met with no opposition. The attack was so sudden and unexpected that at first the citizens were panic-stricken, and the utmost confusion prevailed in the town.

Parties of the raiders rushed about, from place to place, discharging their pistols in every direction. Their weapons were seven-shooters, and each man carried several of them. A number of citizens were killed —the first victim being Mr. E. J. Morrison, who was shot down at the door of Mrs. Beattie's millinery store. Among the killed were a woman and a little girl.

Having completely pillaged the banks, and murdered a number of the citizens of St. Albans, they closed their foul work by seizing the horses from the farmers' wagons and from livery stables, and so made good their escape. Within half an hour from the beginning of the raid they galloped away from the town. During the period of their stay they uttered fearful threats and a good deal of blasphemy. They pretended to be Confederate soldiers, and their language and conduct were such as seemed to warrant their pretence.

Their leader, one Bennet H. Young, pretends to be an officer in the rebel army. We shall publish a portrait of him, together with additional sketches, illustrative of the raid, in our next paper.

The raiders were promptly pursued by a party of armed citizens of St. Albans, under Capt. Conger. The pursuit lay in the direction of Sheldon Creek, at which point the flying robbers set fire to the bridge, in order to protect their retreat. They were, however, followed into Canada, where a number of them—14 at latest accounts—have been captured. They are claimed by the United States, under the extradition treaty, as murderers and burglars. Their examination was commenced at St. Johns, but will probably be completed at Montreal. The Canadian Government has behaved in the most prompt and just manner in this business, and there is no doubt that the miscreants who perpetrated a series of foul murders and robberies at St. Albans will be brought to justice and punished according to their deserts. They are defended at present before the Canadian court by George N. Sanders. If they prove indeed to be Confederate soldiers their case will not be improved, seeing that Canada will exact reparation for violation of a neutral soil.

The greater part of the stolen money has been recovered. The frontier is under arms, and no apprehension need be entertained of any more rebel raids from Canada.

Our sketch of the principal street of St. Albans is from a photograph by Mr. T. G. Richardson, of that town, who was made a prisoner by the raiders, among others that were guarded on the green, in front of the American Hotel, but who escaped unharmed. Mr. Richardson's courtesy to our Artist is gratefully acknowledged.

AT THE FARM.

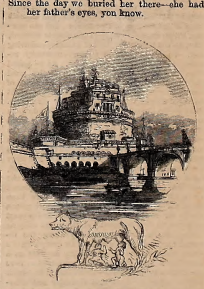
BY ETTA W. PIERCE.

THE dew is on the clover, and the blackbird in the corn;
There's a tuft of starry blossoms out on a branch of that garden thorn.

Listen a moment, and you will hear the sound of the wheel at the mill,
And, piercing sharp through this hazy calm, the stage-horn over the hill.
Well, the cattle browse in the pasture-lands, and the world looks blithe and gay,
As blithe as that summer morning when we watched him marching away.
Mother, 'tis like old times again, to see you in this seat,
With the lilacs nodding overhead and the sweet pinks at your feet.

Do you know how many times we've sat in this same place—you and I—
And looked at the saffron and tawny red afloat in the sunset sky,
The roses blowing along the lane, and the shine of the evening star,
And talked of the many things we'd do when John came home from the war?
How many times in three long years we've watched in the old west room,
And fancied we heard his ringing step a-sounding in the gloom,
From the gate, you know, straight up through the pinks, and over the threshold stone,
Where we sat in the shadows, you and I, in the shadow—ours alone?

There are hearts, I ween, in the town to-day, as happy as hearts may be;
They are back from their hard-fought fields, at last—the boys of Company C.
Who would have thought of a house so still, of a feast unspread to-day?
I had been his bride but a year, you know, when he went marching away.



Oh, I dreamed last night of that dreadful field, the field we know so well!
With its charging columns, its gory dead, and the shriek of its shot and shell.
And I heard the cannon a-sounding deep, and I saw him where he stood,
By the river, whose current was running red, like a tide of human blood.

He was there—my John—with his bare, bright sword, and the voice we used to hear,
Out ringing over the farm at morn, like a trumpet loud and clear,
And the red, red batteries all around—oh, why did I dream the rest?
Why did I deep to see last night that blood-stain on his breast?

They brought my captain back to me in the sunshine yesterday,
With the muffled drum and the wailing fife, and the thick crowds in the way.
The bees were singing along the lane, and the blackbirds in the corn,
And the wind was coaxing the white bloom out from the buds of the garden thorn!

Did you see the light fall under their feet, in streaks, like golden hare,
As they bore him up the broad church aisle, a-sleeping under the stars?
The broad, bright stars he loved so well—oh, the cruel wound they hid!
And the sword was laid, with a stain on its hilt, across the coffin lid.

The baby lies 'neath that blooming thorn—'tis just a month ago
Since the day we buried her there—she had her father's eyes, you know.

THE CASTLE OF ST. ANGELO, ROME.

The house is still—the old farm lays spread out in the sultry noon,
Drowsy and hushed, with only the winds and the yellow bees in tune.
Without, two graves among the flowers, within, a tattered sword,
A little lock of the baby's hair, and two empty seats at the board.
The silence of death in the old west room, and the sighs that the roses make,
And, in the shadow of those two graves, a dumb heart waiting to break!

RED ANDREA PROFFERS HIS SERVICES.

RED ANDREA.

BY C. G. ROSENBERG.

CHAPTER I.

THE Opera—it was and possibly may still be called the Alberto—has closed in Rome. Its doors have been shut upon the lovers of music, for the simple reason that this is the week preceding Easter. Nor is it alone, the Alberto, which has closed its entrance upon the lovers of amusement and the pleasure-seekers in the old Imperial city. Every entertainment which had its doors open to the people, has for the moment closed them and excluded their love of pleasure. At this period, the Roman Catholic world—more especially in th great emporium of its ceremonial observance, where it is so closely under the surveillance of its priests and rulers—is compelled to exhibit a becoming deference to those rules which have been unsurgingly imposed upon its children. It must fast—does not the Roman Church bid its children scrupulously to fast at this period of the year? Moreover it is compelled to abstain from all amusement. Is not all amusement a completely forbidden thing to the Catholic during the penitential week which ushers in the Easter Sabbath?

All around me is gloom and sadness. The clerical, as well as the lay portion of the population, are all abandoned to the solemn observances of the period.

But the strangers, or, rather should I say, the Protestant residents in Rome with the French Roman Catholics, are waiting with impatience for the end of that week of penitential observance. They have looked to it in their own hotels, without thinking it at all necessary to keep up that starvation system, with regard to their fleshly persons, which is enjoined upon all men by the Romish Church. They have eaten and they have drank, as men of the world will eat and drink upon every occasion which presents itself. This occasion has presented itself in consequence of that almost universal sheriffness, in Rome, which was alluded to in a letter which I wrote some days. The hotel-keepers, themselves, have had more time to attend to the fleshly wants of the heretics who are dwelling in their houses, because the Romanists residing under their care have sustained their bodies upon a purely fishy nourishment.

Edward Sheridan is myself—who have been travelling together for the last nine months, and intend to return to London as soon as we have seen the Pope blessing the faithful, in front of the cathedral of St. Peter's, upon the heartily tired of Rome in its drapery of sorrow.

That is the right word, or, rather the right phrase—the drapery of sorrow. Are not all pictures and statues in every church and chapel which dot Rome, as thickly as the currants dot a Christmas cake in more northern climes, draped with sable curtains? Is not a doleful and agonising Miserere the only chant which, during the last days, we have had any chance of listening to in the grand and imposing interior of St. Peter's? Was not a kneeling figure at the shrine of Loretto, with its face buried in its hands and weeping in the agony of its contrition for repented sin, or a stalwart son of the scorching Campagna, standing barefoot and raggedly garmented chest with his clenched fists, before the altar of the holy Virgin, the only chance for dramatic excitement which was offered to our travelling thirst for travelling, by the Ara, or rather the death, which lay around us?

Naturally was it, therefore, that I and my friend Sid should rest on the evening preceding Easter Sunday, offering up an intense thankfulness that Lent had at length drawn to a close.

When, on the following morning, we met at breakfast, it was at once evident that a considerable change had come over the spirit of the scene, in which we were to be found. Bells were ringing with all the cheerfulness that can animate their metal tongues on every side, and the murmur which surged to us from the streets without, was, for the same being, that of an active and joyous city. Vitality had, once again, apparently reanimated that corpse of the past. As we gazed from our windows, those windows by good fortune opened on the external world instead of the interior court-yard, monks and priests might be seen wending their way in all directions. They seemed to swarm into life as the flies do upon and from a dead body. Have you, my good friend, ever seen a flame? If so, has not the same thought stricken you, when you have been looking on the activity which seems to pervade it wherever there is a religious festival? For one forcibly, did the idea suggest itself to my mind, upon the present occasion. The whole of the populace of Rome, of the Seven Hills appeared on that morning somewhat even more than menkish. A brace of cowls or clerical gowns might be counted, by any ready and expert reckoner, in that constantly shifting and edging throng which swept ceaselessly along the illgarred roads and windows, for every cuirass's dress which might be seen doing its duty as a constituent part of the crowd, numerous as were the cuirasses that Papal—which had in its former days of grandeur been first—and last—of the swords Imperial—Rome, By-the-bye, I should have said "every patriotisure's" dress, for the sparking yellow, blue and scarlet, with the strings of gold braids (as say rate, they were very heavily gilt) of the Cuirassier, who from the earliest dawn had been streaming into the capital of the Papal world, very nearly rivalled the clerical hat or cannikin hood in numbers. And what on the round earth is a cuirassier more lovely, what is an the bumor for admiring loveliness, than one of those Roman peasant-women? With a form that, in the midst of a throng of the proportions which might rival that of the Pagan Hunteess Diana, and a royal enough beshy head which might shame a princess of the blood of the sponse of Jove, she is a model for an artist who may be studying in either class of beauty. However, spite of these reflections which occurred to me while gazing upon the crowd, I recurred to my old idea. As Moreton called my attention to a head of more than ordinary grandeur of outline, I sighed involuntarily.

"What is the matter with you?" he asked.

"The fine old place," I muttered rather than said, "is more monk than fly-blown."

"You know that I am a Roman Catholic," was his answer, "yet let me candidly own, that, but a few minutes since, I also was thinking of the same thing."

Some Roman friends had cautioned me on the Thursday previous, when we were taking on the with them—some Romans are there who are visible to their acquaintance even in Passion Week—to be ready in the evening, as, as I seem to remember it was called, if my memory may in this be trusted (thirteen or fourteen years have passed away since I last stood there), the Tizzo di San Pietro. Accordingly, shortly after breakfast, we repaired thither. Carriages had now begun to swarm through the city in every direction. Here rolled the equipage of one of the Foreign Ambassadors. He and his secretary were both in uniform. The servants in pompous liveries sat upon the box and stood behind the carriage. Behind it, at a somewhat slower pace, an entire battalion of cuirassiers indisputably more gorgeous carriage of a high dignitary of the church. You see the glimmer of scarlet and white here there in the window, and an old and crafty-looking head peers from it upon the thronging street. It is that of a cardinal, who is driving in state, and who honored a slender chance of succeeding to the Papal chair. Had he done so, Pio Nono might have remained to the present day an unknown quantity in the list of Roman Princes, but the occupation of the chair of St. Peter may be called so. He has a lovely nice —some say she was his daughter—who is not with him now. In the carriage across the course of the street, a stalwart peasant is nearly crushed by it against the wall, so narrow is the roadway between the side pavements. He utters a savage curse, he stays himself against the rough stone and gazes into the vehicle.

The guide was evidently engaged, passes and crosses himself. It seems to me that a look of terror has stolen over his usually happy countenance.

"Who is it, Filippo?"

Filippo does not answer, but hurries on. At the same time I notice that the muscular individual who had almost been crushed by the carriage is with a gracious nod from the old cardinal, and removing his hand from the bosom of his tanned sheepskin jacket, he says:

"I say, Filippo, who is it?"

Filippo gives an impassive and trembling glance at his friend, and seeing that we are at a safe distance, says:

"It is Red Andrea, Excellenza."

"Red! How the face is as yellow as yours is now, and his hair is darker than mine."

An endeavor to laugh—the veriest ghost of a smile—under the circumstances upon Filippo's visage, has somehow or other he cannot manage to achieve it comfortably. Moreton breaks out into a loud laugh.

"You couldn't look more frightened, Filippo, if he was a brigand."

Filippo jumps as he might have done at a lash from a bandit-whip.

"Is he one?"

"Per Famore di Dio! Signor, don't say that again!" Filippo exclaims, with a groan.

And then, by dint of question and cross-question, we manage to extract the following facts from him:

Four years since Andrea had been a wealthy peasant—that is to say, he made money. How, Filippo knows not. On the evening, three days ere the ceremony we was not at that period a brigand. Among other items of personal property, he possessed a wife, who was famed for her bright beauty. Unlike the generality of the female peasantry of the Campagna, she was fair. She was also a devout Catholic, and, as Filippo puts it, and this circumstance made her loveliness the more remarkable. Andrea cared for her as the most passionate people cares for his sister. It had so happened that a young Roman nobleman, who was staying at the Papal capital, had met with her near her home. He was attracted. "Why," asked Filippo, "should he not be, with the loveliness of Gaetana?" He saw her again and again. At last she consented to leave her home and throw herself upon his protection. When Andrea found that he was alone, his neighbors—for a man has neighbors even on the Campagna—refused to harbor him, and he was driven to a stiletto. The blow had so all appearance had been given by a man who must have been standing behind him, that no one would seem from the manner in which the corpse fell that any other absence of the usual marks of a struggle, or mutilation. In addition to this, his pockets had not been rifled—he was murdered from a close-ably large sum, had not even been touched.

A warrant was at once issued for the apprehension of Andrea Rossi. And, as the supposed he alone could have committed the murder, which had not been wrought for the purpose of plunder, he was at once charged with the crime of murder against him. One of the cardinals—"questo, Monsignore?" ejaculated Filippo, with an emphasis which expressed the utmost indignation, which gave us to understand that he was alluding to the one who had just passed us—had befriended him in his extremity. And, in consequence, Andrea was again allowed to go free.

"And Gaetana?" inquired Edward.

"Ah! La povera fanciulla!" said Filippo, with a sigh, pumped up apparently from the very depths of his chest.

"What became of her?" I asked.

Filippo looked at me and shook his head. He was very evidently trying to imagine a thing out of her misfortunes, but found some difficulty in accommodating his information to the wants of his temporary patrons. It was the only case with which I have ever been acquainted, that left the guide or courier at a loss upon any subject on which they were questioned. Therefore is it that I mark it down, and express my opinion that Filippo must originally have come into the world with some vague notions respecting the propriety of truth in a general point of view. At any rate, all the hesitation which he may probably have felt upon this point, or the difficulties which may have been attendant upon his immediate invention, were speedily at an end.

"The poor child never again saw Andrea!" he said to me, in the most lugubrious of tones.

"How was that?" asked Moreton.

"She took poison, Eccellenza."

"Indeed!" I exclaimed.

"And, poor thing, what pains did she take, or have you forgotten it, Filippo?" Edward inquired.

"Forgotten it, signor!" ejaculated Filippo, with a glance of the most intense surprise. "Did I ever forget any thing?"

"I think it would be impossible to say."

"Acqua tofana?" uttered Filippo with an air of triumph.

He had remembered the name of a well-sounding death potion, and rejoiced in having done so. I bear witness that it had a deal of suicide in that poison bad been rounded on reminiscences of the middle ages. Moreton, therefore, smiled first, and then I laughed.

Filippo's dignity was wounded. He shrugged his shoulders and walked on.

"And this is the cause, then, that has made Andrea, a brig——"

I could go no further. His instantaneously appealing look at me was so wonderfully effective, that it arrested the very word upon my lips. Moreover, we had arrived in the front of St. Peter's Church, which was filled to the square which was acting before it. All was active and busy life, there, for the time being. The great flag, with the crossed keys and the Papal arms and Tiara woven into its silken folds, was streaming lazily on the sunshine from the tower of the castle of St. Angelo. The bridge which is at the end of the Swiss Papal Guard were playing. Around them were a dense and closely-packed throng, over whose heads we saw the columns of spray from the fountains flashed into the air, and fell in the pendant jets of the statues that they might see the Pope when he should issue from the gate of the huge cathedral. The crowd had arrived much too early, and it was by labor and the most unflinching impudence that Edward at last found six inches square of footing for which he mounted at the imminent risk of breaking his neck, while I remained below in company with the very honest and remarkably intelligent Filippo.

Quarter of an hour had slowly passed away. My friend began to grow uncomfortable.

He was already weary of his elevation. He grumbled in no peculiarly measured terms, at the want of philanthropy in his immediate neighbor, who either could not or would not permit him to have the additional inch of space, upon the bench on which he was standing.

The murmur of tongues around us hushed for a moment. All was silence.

Then the hum and buzz of life again broke from that momentary stillness. With, as it were, a long and deep sigh of relief, the human beings stretching before us swayed in the direction of the portals of the church. At the same instant, the choirs, which had been concealed from our view, burst out into a triumphant song, and the Pope issued from the door of St. Peter's.

He was borne on a splendidly carved and richly gilded chair, which was borne by six sturdy-looking priests, who might, as far as theews and appearance were changed places with any six of the Papal Guard.

In the hands of two younger clerical functionaries were immense fans, two immense fans of peacock's feathers, which were mounted upon silver-handed ashen staves. Before, were two bishops, and two mitred abbots with burning incense. Cardinals, dressed in their purposing robes, Archbishops, Bishops and Mitred Abbots surrounded him. Following them were the Swiss Guards in long files closing the procession. But at their heels came an even denser throng, which as he was borne towards the steps that led to the platform of the cathedral, arrayed itself down towards the crowd which already filled the usually vacant area before it. It ebbed and then flowed, and then surged together the waves of humanity grew denser and heavier. Yet, singular to say, no cry of suffering was heard. Women, children, priests and peasants, the soldiers and the populace, all knelt in solemn silence.

Then the old and feeble man stretched out his hands and blessed us. Heaven forgive me if I were wrong, but in that supposed to me, that the blessing was heard above. So still was all around —so universal a calm rested upon that immense multitude, that I even fancied my ears could detect the sound of that voice. And yet I had seen him and he had spoken to me before, and his voice was so low and feeble in its utterance, that this must have been impossible.

From his fingers fluttered down two papers, which passed through the air down the balcony. Then I knew not what these contained. A written forgiveness of sins for the faithful, and a written curse on the enemies of the church were those two papers. At that time I knew not what the monument meant, and only heard the murmur of the strange beneath the gallery to obtain the smallest torn scrap from them. As they fell—or perhaps it ought to be said when they had fallen on the heads rotted from the gallery, and at the same instant every church bell in Rome sent its clangor to the sound that broke from the immense multitude.

They were rising from their knees.

Scarcely had I risen, than Filippo touched my arm. He had been kneeling beside me.

"What is it?" I demanded, hastily.

The truth is—let me out with it, confession is good for the soul—that I was somewhat ashamed, for a Protestant, for having permitted my knees to become lapped in that fit of Roman devotion.

"Look, Eccellenza."

"Where, and at what?" was the angry question which I put to him.

"There!" said Filippo, extending his finger in a manner that struck me as being somewhat less frankly significant than the action of his finger and arm generally was. Suffice it that I looked round, and I did so, my eyes fell upon a figure it had very certainly not been in the expectation to behold so near me.

It was Red Andrea.

He was still upon his knees. His arms were crossed athwart his brawny chest, which appeared to have been with his concentrated energies. His head was humbly bent towards the earth, and as it appeared to me, he traces of two huge tears rolling down his cheeks, which were handy-lined face. Barely, however, had I the time to fancy that I noted this, than he rose. With a proud gesture, and a haughty defiance, he wore half ashamed of the emotion he had displayed, he tossed his long leathern jacket closely around his form, and striding away from the colonnade, crossed the Place of St. Peter.

Not knowing what I did, I sprang to follow him among the already fragmentary and melting crowd. Edward had laid his hand upon my arm, and his voice, as he did so, rang upon my ear.

"Where are you rushing to, my dear fellow?"

I struggled hastily from under his hand, and looked around. The crowd were fast leaving the spot, which, on the morrow, would have come to and its return to its usual monkish repose and stillness.

The annual blessing had been given, and the annual curse had been scattered to the winds.

CHAPTER II.

WHAT is there that I can be more delicately lovely than the still and calm and gentle beauty of an evening in Central Italy—an evening when the sun is yet so young that the presence of the sunset has brought no sorrow in its wake with the freshening breezes that have been cradled upon the Middle Sea? At such a moment the young imagine that the dream, for, with me we are young dreaming is imagination, and as we grow old the activity of the imagination becomes merely a dreaming. The youth imagines the future, while age dreams over the past.

Edward Moreton and myself had been dining, and had sat down to our wine, when the coffee stood on the table in the apartment which we occupied.

The windows were wide open and permitted the cool air of evening to pass through them and search our persons with its somewhat keen yet pleasant embrace, while we chatted, two young boys, in an idle humor, with our Havanese cigars, and sipped from time to time our rapidly cooling coffee—for, by the by, I should have hardly failed enough in its way, as it generally is in central and southern Europe, a Spaniard could most certainly have detected the table a little sooner, and have decidedly not have recognised it as the veritable and genuine juice of the Mocha berry.

We had been imagining all those possibilities and impossibilities which might find a temporary resting place in the brains of youth. Strangely enough, that identical food or Black Arabes with whose immediate contemplation we had been staring formed an occular acquaintance, had become the main topic of our conversation.

"Then you really believe that Andrea murdered the young Vicenzes?" inquired Edward.

"Why not?" I asked, with a philosophical twirl to the strong end of my cigar.

"You do then believe it?"

"Most indubitably!"

"Of course in that case, you put no faith in the devout humility displayed by him this morning?"

"I thought you were a Roman Catholic?"

"When I said that, I did not think. He very clearly foresaw what I was about to say.

"You ought to know that absolution and the confession of the sin are all of a piece," I said, in a tone of intense philosophical gravity. "He may have put the Viennese out of the way, yet you know he as decidedly harmless as you or myself."

"He may," said Moreton, dubiously.

"But I say, good sirs, I am certain he is."

"Nevertheless," responded my friend, "I should prefer Filippo as my guide to the aforesaid Andrea—especially upon a dark night, and more especially by night in the city of Seven Hills."

"All I can say is, that I am by no manner of means certain that I should."

As I uttered this, and what is more, as I uttered it with an air of the coolest, Nay! may I not say of the most superb indifference, a gentle, master-of-fact knock come at the door of our apartment.

"Come in," ejaculated Edward, as I turned my head lazily towards it.

The waiter who was in attendance upon our floor of the hotel, entered the room. He came for the purpose of informing our "Excellencies," that Filippo had very suddenly been taken ill, and would consequently be unable to attend us on this evening. Now, we were comparatively strangers in Rome, and he had been engaged by us for more than a week past, with a special view to his services upon this day. It must be confessed that the annoyance was enough to make the most Christian-like of modern saints swear like a trooper who has to turn into the saddle, just as he is sitting down to a grilled brace of fowls whose necks he has wrung, without paying for them, at the nighest henroost.

"What the dence has happened to the rascal?"

It may be observed that Moreton put little faith in his alleged sickness: neither, to tell the truth, did I.

"Eccellenza!" answered the waiter, "I am unable to say. His mother has just presented herself for the purpose of making his excuses."

"Can we get any one in his place?" asked I, with a view to the practical necessities of the case.

"It will be very difficult to find an attendant to-night, Eccellenza, at this late hour."

"Confound the scamp!" said Edward.

"Go and try to find somebody who knows the localities and understands French." You will observe that at this period my own Italian, as well as Ned's, was somewhat homœopathically accommodated to our wants.

We subsequently found out that the amiable Filippo's malady had been occasioned by the temptations held out to him by a Russian nobleman—hang the Russians! they seem in Europe always to have the gold of the Ural, and the diamonds of Golconda at their disposal, to say nothing of any quantity of platinum—to consecrate that evening to his examination of the illuminations of St. Peter's. The rascal was offered double what we had given him by the day, for his services. Therefore he had been taken with a sudden fit of the cholera, which, as cholera then was, might, if a veritable attack of that disease, have dispatched him upon the morrow.

The evening had gradually darkened, and the sky had assumed the deep blue which is so characteristic of the night-heaven of Italy. Indeed it was not blue. It was a full rich purple, and the golden stars glanced from and spangled it in the style that the specks of golden metal flash and glisten upon the blue velvet robe in which actors enact the part of "Richard the Third." Or, for in some manner it seems to me that the shaping of this simile detracts from their beauty, they starred and gleamed upon the purple heaven of night, like themselves alone, the wondrous diamonds, carbuncles and topazes set by the hand of God in the broad lapis-lazuli of the outspread firmament.

"Look, Edward, is not night in this clime beautiful?"

"Hang him!" replied my friend, rising and coming to the balcony beside me, "we shall have to go out alone in Rome at this time, or miss the illumination."

Scarcely had these words quitted his lips, than the waiter again entered the apartment.

"Have you found one?"

"Yes, Eccellenza! Shall I tell him to enter?"

"Certainly."

The waiter went out, and in another moment Red Andrea strode heavily into the room.

"The ——!" well, let us call it the gentleman in a suit of sable, for the purpose of avoiding an imputation of reckless profanity—was Ned's instantaneous ejaculation.

Even as my friend uttered this, I looked up in Andrea's face. Nothing could have been more statuesquely rigid and immobile than its harsh, yet dignified outline. It was evident enough that he very certainly had not the slightest acquaintance with the English language. Few or none of the Italian peasantry, as might naturally be expected, understand a word of it, save it be those national expletives which have generally rendered our tongue so masterly an idiom for putting oneself in a rage.

"Carlo," said the black-muzzled Campagnard, "tells me that your Excellencies require a guide for this evening."

He must at least have stood some six foot three inches in height. His shoulders recalled to me those of the Farnese Hercules; but his waist, as far as I could make it out under his loose sheepskin jacket, was much slighter. To my extreme astonishment he had addressed us in capital French—perhaps I ought to have said most capital, considering that it was shapen by the lungs of an Italian peasant who was supposed to pick up a dubious living on the Roman Campagna.

"But you are most assuredly no professional guide?"

The models for sculptors and painters are, it may be observed, professional. Such also is a religious mendicant. Couriers, too, are generally considered so. Why, you will allow me to ask, should not a guide share in the same appellation?

"No, your Excellency."

"Then of what earthly use," whispered Moreton, "can he possibly be to us?"

"However," continued Andrea, "if your Excellencies should be disposed to employ me, I will take admirable care of both of you."

"You scoundrel!" interjected Moreton, in thoroughly emphatic Saxon, "I don't doubt it in the least."

"Be quiet, Ned. We will go with him."

"Nonsense! I won't."

"Then allow me to assure you that I shall."

Saying this, I turned, and taking my hat, flung my cloak or capote, or whatever else it might be called, across my shoulders. But chancing at the same moment to cast a glance upon the swart visage of my red acquaintance, I discovered an unmistakeable smile of satisfaction—it was true that it was of the grimmest order—breaking over it. Now, could he by any possibility have understood what Edward and myself had been talking of? Or could he have guessed at our meaning? If so, was he flattered by my faith in his honesty? But, No! that he did not understand English was a certainty. How then could he have guessed at that which we had been saying?

"Your Excellencies will be too late to see the change."

"Certainly we shall."

As I said this I preceded him from the room. On issuing into the street, I found that Edward had accompanied us. He had only lingered for a moment to secure his pistols about him. When, taking my arm, he slapped the breast-pocket of his coat emphatically to show me that he was ready for all chances, I could scarcely forbear from laughing. Afterwards, I learnt that care of one's bodily integrity on the streets of Rome after sunset was not altogether quite so laughable a matter.

Andrea asked us where we would wish to go, and I necessarily—Moreton seemed now not to take the slightest interest in our proceedings—left the choice with him.

He accordingly led us to the bridge of St. Angelo. It was thronged with gazers of every description, and it was with some difficulty that we obtained, by dint of the use Andrea made of his shoulders, a place close to the balustrade of the bridge.

Who is there that has once gazed upon the glorious outline of that façade of fire can ever suffer it to escape from his memory? The whole of that wonderful and mighty dome, the dome of St. Peter's which even by daylight overawes the eye by its vast size as well as the marvellous harmony of its proportions, is traced, as it were, in lines of living fire upon the luminous purple of the firmament. Those heavenly opals, the stars, dim, when contrasted with the yellow radiance of the innumerable spots of flame which fleck the outlines that seem burnt into the overarching sky of night. The fiery structure actually quivers with radiance, and, seen from the spot on which we were standing, reduplicating itself in the tawny Tiber which rolls beneath our feet, would appear to be some huge transparency. So grandly imposing is it, that the stranger might almost deem it to be the toil of fairy fingers, a creation whose weird and supernatural beauty should pass away without the slightest chance of returning upon his sense.

"How grandly superb it is!"

"Your Excellency will have to wait yet," growled Andrea; "it will be only for a few moments."

"For what?"

"The signal has not been given."

"What signal?"

"Listen, Eccellenza."

When he said this, the report of a cannon boomed upon the air. Looking up at the castle of St. Angelo I saw the white wreath of smoke—it was yellow under the influence of the light from St. Peter's—curling slowly into the air.

"Look!" cried Moreton, seizing my arm.

Turning again towards the cathedral, my sight was almost blinded by the excess of radiance. The whole of that mighty dome seemed to have broken into flame. Thousands of men must have been employed in producing this sudden change. Not a square inch was there upon its surface, or seemed to be, which was not lit up and glowing and burning upon the stillness of the air of night. The heavy pitch garlands, which during the day had been hung upon every portion of the vast roof, had all of them been touched with fire. Even the gallery on the summit of the cupola and the gigantic cross which towered above it, had every point within its circle or upon its enormous limbs touched with light. Each line was clearly made out. It flashed and quivered and yet burned steadily upon the calmness of the heaven, which hung mellowed above the glowing arch of that immense dome of flame.

"See!" uttered Andrea.

As he said this his arm was extended in the direction of the cross. He had before seemed a giant, but now looked at, after my sight had been resting upon that vast and luminous architecture of fire, he had dwarfed down into a very ordinary specimen of humanity.

"The poor devil who climbed up to touch with light the topmost point of that emblem of our most holy Roman faith"—at the time I did not notice the strange manner in which his voice, as he said this, sneered at the religion which had in the morning, to all appearance, so profoundly impressed him—"got twenty-five scudi for doing so. Would either of your excellencies attempt it for five thousand?"

"I should rather imagine not," replied Moreton.

"Make the five thousand as necessary to me as the twenty-five were probably to him," was my response—it is very likely that I should."

"Right, Eccellenza; there is no such spur as necessity. Seven years since, I lit that cross for the last time."

"You did?"

"Yes, signor."

"And might I ask what induced you to do so?" My usual appetite for the romantic induced this question.

"They had none else, when I undertook it, who would do so. The twenty-five scudi enabled me to do what I wished to accomplish."

Saying this he paused, but again continued:

"On the Monte Pincio, Eccellenza, the view of the blazing St. Peter's is even more sublime. Shall we go there?"

Ned touched my arm.

"Yes," was my response.

"Good heavens!" he ejaculated, in very astonished Saxon, "you don't think of it."

Wrapping my cloak closely around my body, I began to battle my way across the crowded bridge. Now, whether it was that my friend's immediate courage had failed him or that he really did contrive somehow or other, against his own inclinations, to get separated from us in the narrow but thronging alleys through which we passed, I know not. Certain is it that when we halted at a little inn and got a couple of mules to mount the hill, he was not with us. Reconciling myself to his absence as well as I could, without a single thought of the anterior history of Red Andrea, saving and excepting those hints which he had given us respecting the operations of his younger days, I placed myself in his charge. After a ride of some twenty minutes or more, we accordingly found ourselves close to a small cottage which in those days did duty as a humble class of tavern upon the Monte Pincio. Dismounting and flinging my bridle to Andrea, I sat down on a large stone, which had apparently long officiated as a horse-block before the tavern, and gazed back upon the burning façade of St. Peter's.

Gorgeous indeed was the view of the cupola when seen from this spot. Never before had my waking dreams of fairyland received such a living realisation, or been made so tangible to my senses. The dome would seem to have been literally hewn from a blazing and burning sun. Of such a wondrous masonry might a poet have fancied that the palaces were reared and shapen in a Pagan Paradise. Nearer to us and beneath it all was dark. Houses, trees and buildings of every description intervened and kept the lower portion of the illuminated temple invisible. Nevertheless, light was thrown upwards from it. It seemed as if the starry dome was balanced and floated upon a subjacent ocean of lurid flame. At the same time the sounds of music lapsing into indistinctness, and the harmony of ringing bells, mingled with the dense murmur of the life below, struggled to my ears, while around him and myself, and the half-dozen strangers with their guides and couriers who had collected on the spot, there hung a silent and threefold night. Nay, the very stars that spangled the purple of the heavens, seemed to twinkle and flash there, with a dimmer and fainter radiance.

How long I remained, silent and absorbed, looking upon that sublime vision of beauty, it would be impossible for me now to say.

Be it sufficient that I took no note of time. Gradually did that earthly substitute for the sun extinguish, the last faint spark that my glance could detect upon it had smouldered out, when at last I rose from my seat.

All around me was in solitude and darkness, save a light or two which still glowed from the interior of the tavern. The moon lay hidden yet under the eastern horizon, but a flood of yellow light indicated the spot whence it must soon emerge. At a little distance from me stood the tall figure of Andrea, dark and colorless against the range of the sky, in whose canopy, above my head, the stars again glowed with their wonted Italian lustre. In its then excited state—for who could gaze on such a scene, nor have his imagination kindled by it?—he struck my fancy as the last of the Titans might, gazing, after the battle of Olympus, on the field where the red bolts of Jove had been quenched in death upon the heaped bodies of his brethren, slain in the attempt to scale the skies and dispossess the son and heir of their common sire of the empire of the heathen Heaven. Such, I say, was my momentary dream as I turned towards him. Then I came back upon my daily allowance of common sense.

"Will the Eccellenza return?"

Certainly the Eccellenza would return, but first he was disposed to try what kind of wine could be procured at the road-side inn. However, he was inclined to drink it in the open air. Giving, therefore, my purse to Andrea, I despatched him into the tavern, whence he speedily returned bearing with him a huge skin and two horn cups. The skin—it was the first bottle of the kind I had ever seen—was filled with the red wine, one occasionally procures good in Italy, its expense at that time varying from about four to ten cents for a skin full, which contains all sorts of quantities from one to three quarts. Andrea, I said, had borne with him two horn cups. It was clear, therefore, that he intended, as I had meant he should, doing me the honor of assisting at the emptying of the skin; and, to tell the truth, his intention seemed to me somewhat of the free and easy description. Nevertheless, I bore with it. My determination had been made up to learn something of my red companion. He was essentially a singular specimen of humanity, and I fancied I should like to know more of him. Therefore, I again seated myself on the horse-block, when what was my intense astonishment to see the aforesaid Andrea squat on the earth immediately opposite to me. Squeezing out a good half-pint of the juice of the the grape into one of the horn-cups, he extended it to me in the most patronising of styles, and then filling the other, with a brief—

"By your permission, and to your health, Eccellenza!" he drained it to the bottom.

You are uncommonly gracious, Master Andrea—thought I to myself, as I imitated his proceeding. Then, leaning back upon the horse-block, I resolved to commence the ceremony of pumping him, with far less delicacy than I had originally intended upon preserving in the operation. My readers may observe, in what follows, that he met me considerably more than half-way. Subsequently, it has indeed occurred to me, that he might have had his lips so long locked among his own fellows, and had experienced such a thorough dearth of companionship amongst his countrymen, that he must have from the first determined upon making me his confidant. It was a queer selection. We were of different countries, and of decidedly different degrees in life. He was, at the very least, nearly double my age.

"You then, Andrea, have lit the pitch garlands on the cross?" I began.

"Si! Si! Eccellenza!"

"And you did that to get the twenty-five scudi?" I inquired.

"Yes, Signor."

He paused for a moment, and then continued:

"I had a sister, Eccellenza!" Filippo had then told us the fact as regarded her existence. "She was young, and they told me she was beautiful. I loved her—I loved her, Eccellenza!" This was said with deep and passionate feeling. "Our parents had died when we were both young. She was left with me to care for her; and I did—I did care for her. The Holy Mother knows that I did." Here he paused, and it might have seemed to me that he had stopped to allow his grief fair way, but that my eyes were bent upon his figure. What was my surprise, to see that his past love for his sister, did not stand in the way of his attentions to the wine-skin. Filling his cup again, he assuaged his sorrow by emptying it. "It was to give her the means of learning to read and write, that I exposed my limbs to the chances of breaking my neck. At that time I was a fool—a poor fool—Eccellency! It seemed to me, that education with her beauty might fit her to become a Contezza or Princippezza. In my mind, all education was bound up in reading and writing. For a man there was perhaps something more. But what could a woman want besides these. At all events she had them. Afterwards I grew richer. After three years, there was no necessity for me to risk climbing up that cross. But with money, there was a necessity of work to obtain it, and I worked like a slave."

"At what?"

"There is no necessity for my telling you that—Eccellenza—suffice it that I worked. But my work took me a great deal from our home—a hut on the Campagna." When he said this he extended his hand, as it appeared unconsciously, in the direction of the now risen moon, whose light was marking his face, on which the lines of strong feeling were rendered visible. "It is my home—still. Does Gætana ever think of it?" The rascal Filippo had clearly been lying. He had practised upon our credulity. "It happened that a young Venetian who was then stopping in Rome saw her. The poor girl, like myself, put too great faith in the powers of her loveliness. Santa Maria! she was as beautiful as the Pagan Venus—Eccellenza! You can imagine what followed." As he uttered this, he bounded to his feet, and thrust his hand in his breast. For the moment I started upright—but scarcely had I done so, than the fit changed. "Ha! ha! ha! You do not think that I killed him. Oh, no! He was found, though, in the street with a hole in his breast that was quite wide enough to let his soul through. Do you think, Eccellenza! that it is in hell? I do. They arrested me, signor! for the—they called it murder. I thought it justice. He was enjoying an income as an agent of the Holy Office—consequently they thought that some one must be made an example of. But by the Virgin, they reckoned without their host. I also happened to be—". Here he suddenly stopped and seemed to reflect. The convulsing rage and agony of his countenance broke into a bitter smile, and lifting the wine-skin to his lips he made an awful inroad upon its contents. Indeed, he emptied it, and squeezing it together in his hands, tossed it away from him. "Well," he continued, "I happened to be a particular friend of one of the cardinals. They could prove nothing. Power never rids itself of utilities." The fellow was evidently a bit of a philosopher. "Accordingly I was set free."

"And Gætana!"

"Since that time I have never once cast a glance upon the poor girl."

"But you say that she is not dead?"

"Nor is she, signor."

Now, greatly as my curiosity had been excited, while he had been speaking, to learn what had become of her, allow me to own that I did not like to ask him. The foolish delicacy of which I have long since cured myself, prevented my doing so. "The foolish delicacy," I have written, and let it stand; for, after a very brief pause, he continued, with more rapidity, and in a tone which convinced me he was attempting to jeer himself into tranquility:

"A week or two after the death of this Viennese Don Giovanni, she found a second lover. This was a wealthy Neapolitan banker, who had taken a fancy to her tears, if she shed any, and her grand Roman beauty. With him she quitted Rome. It was a good jest, was it not, Eccellenza? They thought that the brother had got rid of one lover to throw her into the arms of another. In Naples she studied music, and when the old banker wearied of her, or she grew tired of him, she went upon the operatic stage."

Here he paused.

"Would you wish to know who my sister is? She is called La Signora ———."

But it will be best not to mention the name which he then told me, as, although never out of Italy, public rumor in that country attributed her paternity to a priest, who had been a bishop, and was at the time a cardinal.

"Should you be travelling eastward you may in all probability see her. She is now in Venice. Nay, you may fall in love with her." He gnashed his teeth savagely together as he said this. "Her beauty has been more lasting than the red and white of human flesh generally is."

When he uttered the concluding words of this sentence his head had sunken forward upon his chest, the convulsive action of which told me with what a bitter control he had restrained his passions while speaking. It remained in this position for some time. At length he slowly raised it, and I saw by the moonlight, which was now broad and clear, that his jetty eyes were bent upon me earnestly.

"What think you," he asked, "of the chances for the regeneration of Italy?"

Let me confess that this question amazed me, but the form in which it was put amazed me still more. It had been couched in very excellent English—so excellent, indeed, that I could scarcely have conceived it was not a native of England or an American who was speaking. Literally starting back with astonishment, my under jaw dropped, and I looked upon the Titanic and vigorously shapen limbs of the man before me as I might have gazed upon a sudden apparition.

RED ANNEX.

"Man," he sadly continued, "is a strange creature, a singular mixture, a make up of shreds and patches, of feeling and separation. I am, as you may guess from that which I have said, a servant of the powers that are, in the city which once governed the world. My daily work is theirs, simply for the reason that I must live. But my faith tells me that the time will yet arrive when the temporal government of the Roman States will be wrenched from the hands of him who fills the chair of St. Peter. Those who have the charge of our salvation"—he spoke this reverently and with a certain air of humility—"will not be burdened with the care of our police and the imposition of our taxes. Excellenza, that will be a fair and brilliant day for the west of the old Roman Empire."

Ruby had he uttered this than a shout from a lower portion of the road reached my ears. Turning around, for I had recognized the voice of my friend Sigli, I saw the light of a lantern as it strobes winding up the road. He was searching for me.

"Andrea," I said, reverting my head.

He was not there. I gazed around me. He had vanished.

"You are safe, then," cried Ned, as the torchlight streamed upon my face.

"To be sure I am."

Rushing forward, my friend flung his arms around me, and gave me such a squeeze that I candidly imagined my ribs would have cracked. It was with anything but a kindly return for the proof of affection developed, by his embrace, that I thrust him from me.

"I am truly glad of it."

"What on earth did you bring these fellows for?"

My fingers pointed to the two torch bearers, whom I had but little difficulty in recognizing as members of the Roman police, alias Gensdarmes, Sbirri, or whatever else they may be called.

"Do you know or what Red Andrea is?"

"How should I?"

"Some four or five years since he was arrested for murder—that however you have heard."

"And was released—"

"That he might be sent to a madhouse."

Very quietly did I go towards my mule, loosed her, him it is, and mounted. Edward did the same, and we returned to the city. As we dismounted at the inn where Andrea had engaged the mules, an awkward fact struck me.

"You must pay for them, my good fellow."

"Have you forgotten your purse?"

"Yes," I replied, with a slight cough.

He had not. I never thought it necessary to tell him how I came to have suffered it to slip from my pocket. Condemn it, however, as a fair if mad, Red Andrea had on that night some slight return of sanity. What makes me so positive upon this point I leave my readers to decide in their own minds.

VERSES.

BY MARION POWELL.

A rose to me is ever sweet,
But this is doubly so,
Because it rested near the heart
Whence love and Friendship flow.

You gave this Rose in all its bloom—
Its fragrance filled the air,
But ah, it withers, fades, and dies,
In spite of all my care.

Alas! 'tis drooping even now,
Its leaves fall one by one,
Behold, even while I fondly gaze,
All its sweet life seems gone!

Alas! shall this an emblem be
Of Friendship I thought true?
Nay, do not let our Friendship droop,
As fading Roses do.

THE SECRET OF THE MANOR.

CHAPTER XXIV.—A LORDLY WOOER.

Nina was first in the gardens that evening. She no longer dreaded to meet Lord Gillingham. Her decision was made, and she knew that it was a wise and proper one, from the sudden peace that had fallen on her spirit. Calmly now, and without a struggle, she left her fate in high hands. After long and bitter wrestlings, Nina had come on the hidden truth at last.

There must have been some expression in her face that was not very encouraging to a wooer such as Lord Gillingham, for as he took her cold hand and pressed it, he felt sure, somehow, that his cause was lost.

"You gave me every hope last night," he blurted out in a disappointed tone. "I have publicly announced our engagement; it seems to me rather late to retract now."

"I am sorry if you have misled you," answered Nina, quietly; "but it seems to me better for both that I should retract now than repent when it is too late."

"And pray may I ask what has made you change your mind so suddenly?" inquired the earl, with restrained anger. "The fickleness of your sex is proverbial, but I might have expected to find you ready to hold by a promise so solemnly as last night."

"I gave you no promise."

"It was implied, if not actually spoken. You certainly meant me to understand that I should be accepted."

"I am afraid I did; but since then circumstances have occurred—"

"What circumstances?" asked the earl, sharply.

"That poor Rose Woodman," answered Nina, in a sad, gentle voice, more suggestive than reproachful.

"And they have been telling you that I was to blame there?"

Nina bowed her head.

"Then I say it is a lie!"

But Dame Oldum said—"

"I am not accountable for her falsehoods, roughly interrupted the earl.

"But you must have known of these reports, my lord, and, for the poor girl's sake, it was your duty to contradict them."

"It was not my duty to trouble myself at all with the matter. If people will talk, let them talk."

"In fact, you promised Dame Oldum to be silent," said Nina, with cold scorn. "I begin to understand the whole affair now."

"My motive was one most women would readily forgive; it was to win you."

"And do you think that was the way?" said Nina, indignantly. "I hope I have more heart and conscience than to be bought by another woman's tears. And after destroying Rose's young happiness, and ruining her home, how were you any nearer to me? Can you answer me that question?"

The earl began to see that his interests would best be consulted by candor and honesty. He would rather have told a lie, if it would have secured his object as well; but it would not, and he felt it advisable, for once in his life, to speak the truth.

"Upon my honor," began his lordship, "that the dame had managed to hear in some way of my affection for you."

"Not from you, I may mean," interrupted Nina, as haughty as any princess.

"There was no necessity for this; it was already generally known. It has long been the fashion of the neighborhood to join our two names together."

"And what was the arrangement between you and Dame Oldum?"

"I will tell you exactly," answered the earl, with charming candor, "and you will see then how highly I regard your favor."

"Well, go on."

"The dame was to use some influence she possessed over you for my benefit, on condition that I helped her to dispose of Rose Woodman, so as to get her out of her son's way."

"And you, a nobleman, a man of ancient lineage," exclaimed Nina, flushing deep red in her indignation—"you entered into such a shameful contract! My God, I thank Heaven that I had found it impossible to become your wife."

"Have a care—don't provoke me too far," said the earl, in a deep, hoarse voice, and with his dark eyes gave a sudden flash of menace. "I don't pretend to be a saint. But I loved you, and I made you a fair offer: many women, higher than you, and quite as beautiful, would have jumped at it. I shouldn't call it much like an insult for a man in my position to bestow his love on the daughter of a country lawyer."

"Your love?" exclaimed Nina, her round red lip curling with scorn. "Why do you desecrate the name? Dame Oldum's confidant, Rose Woodman's tradncer, my lover!"

"The first post I seemed to have shared with you for some time past," said the earl, trying to check his passion, in order that he might strike every separate blow with effect. "She cannot talk enough of your generosity to her. I could not do to believe everything you hear, I know; but some people seem to think that Miss Nina Marsh's morals are hardly as those of Cesar's wife should be, above suspicion; and under these circumstances Cesar himself might naturally expect some little license. Five miles beyond the old wood there is a bleak, desolate spot where the rocks are high and the tides strong. The dame says she met you there one evening bent on a strange errand. That may be scandal, but it has a wonderful air of truth, especially when you bear the whole tale."

Nina tried to move away, weakly, but he caught fiercely hold of her hands.

"You will marry me now?" he hissed, into her ear.

"Never!" she said; "I would die first!"

"If you refuse me you must take the consequences!"

"That I am willing to do," she answered, freeing herself by a sudden effort. "I would rather die a thousand times than be your wife."

Nina's heart beat violently when she received the message, and she felt sure that the interview would be a painful one. She was right in her conjecture.

For one whole day Nina saw no more of him than a distant figure on horseback, or a carriage and four. The next day, however, he came to the house, and sent word that he must see her.

Nina's heart beat violently when she received the message, and she felt sure that the interview would be a painful one. She was right in her conjecture.

He walked up to the fireplace as he spoke, and remained for several minutes in earnest conversation with Mr. Marsh. Nina watched them both as if her very life hung suspended from their lips. She saw a tear he was ashamed to wipe away glide slowly down her father's face. He turned and glanced at her momentarily, then gave deeper attention to Cyril's words. And now Mrs. Marsh ventured to draw near to her daughter, and they had the explanation of what had bred on her mother's bosom. What an age it seemed before Cyril returned!

"Well, sir you like," had Mr. Marsh said, as he walked out of the room, and then Cyril had come back to them.

"I am content," Mr. Marsh to offer you the following terms," he said, addressing himself to Colonel St. George: "The step you contemplate of withdrawing my daughter suddenly from her father's house would cause a very great and unnecessary exposure. Mr. Marsh, therefore, proposes that you should return to London to-morrow morning, where Nina shall follow you after a month, her mother accompanying her. During this time your engagement shall be generally and publicly announced, and a few days after Mrs. Marsh and her daughter have joined you in town your marriage can be inserted in the Times, Nina dated, as if through a mistake. If you consent to this arrangement Mr. Marsh will, on my consent, entrance into a bond, to be forfeited to your account the sum of ten thousand pounds, the dowry he had always designed for his daughters on their marriage; if you refuse she will go to you quite completely penniless, and further intercourse between the two families shall immediately cease."

Colonel St. George hesitated a moment, then he said, firmly:

"You can tell Mr. Marsh that I agree to his terms."

Then he came and sat down by his wife, taking her hand with more tenderness than he had yet shown, but she shrank and cowered away from him with a strife, despairing, grasping agitation, void of her mother, as if she could alone protect her. An expression of real pain darkened Sir George's face. Mabel was his wife's companion to him and horror of his caresses. He felt humiliated, besides, that this display should have been made before Captain Marsh, a rival, and one evidently preferred to himself. He ground his teeth sharply together, and it was only by a great effort he could command himself sufficiently to speak with patience.

"I am sorry that you should show all this temper, Nina. Have you reflected as to the ill effect it must have on others? You are my wife; we have a long future, in all probability, to pass together."

Nina shuddered convulsively.

"It is only right that both of us should make an effort to render this future as pleasant as possible. I am ready to do my part. I will even acknowledge, if you like, that I have not treated you well—that my flirtation as to having another wife after your decease you was cruel and unwarrantable; but all this is not irreparable, and may be atoned for. Come, Nina, you must see that my remarks are reasonable enough. Neither of us can alter his or her fate; it truly remains for us to make the best of it. I am perfectly satisfied with my share of the bargain; I only want to see you the same."

"It is too late!" said Nina, shaking her head sadly; "my love is all gone."

"It may return."

"Never."

"What hope is there either for you or myself if it does not?"

Nina answered him only with her tears.

He took her from her mother's arms into his own. He was very patient. He had a feeling of true repentance for the wrong he had done her, and he loved her better at this moment than he had ever done before. The sense of his injustice towards her made him patient as well as tender. Mrs. Marsh, who was naturally impressionable and forgiving, and had been present in the action that a husband's power was absolute and indisputable, began to feel the same sympathy for Colonel St. George as her own children as she had formerly shown for Captain Marsh. She certainly reprobated his cruel conduct, but she thought that from the moment he, in his position, condescended to ask pardon of a wife, it was his wife's duty to grant it immediately, forget all his errors and take him to her heart. Mrs. Marsh did not know how to use masculine herself. If her husband murdered her she would have found some excuse for him with her last breath. She began to think it a hard fact for Colonel St. George that after having made such humiliating confessions as she considered them, he should still be treated with coldness and disdain.

"My dear, he is your husband," said Mrs. Marsh to her daughter, in a tone whose gentle dominance was very much the result of her own nature. "It would be so much better for you to make up your mind to treat him properly."

"You forget that he has treated me, mama," she said, a little resentfully, and she struggled out of Colonel St. George's arms and stood confronting her mother and him while she went on speaking; "that I would forgive him his cruel conduct willingly if he could only remove the consequences."

"They are removed now," said Colonel St. George.

"No; they are beyond your reach and beyond your knowledge, most of them. You cannot prevent me from living in continual fear and misery. You might have saved me all this if you had acted with common honor and kindness at first, but you did not, and now I tell you that the consequences of your conduct are beyond your knowledge and indirectly beyond your reach. What is done cannot be undone. To say that I would give my life to undo the past is but using a very emphatic term in my case, for my life is more than valueless to me, it is utterly distasteful; but I would consent to slow bodily tortures of the most terrible kind only to have my mind at once once more. If I am forced to come back to you, Colonel St. George, I will, but only because I must. The sole atonement now in your power for all the bitter wrong done to me is to give me your name before the world, and then to leave me free to dispose of my own future. I will promise to lead such a retired and blameless life that no taint of suspicion shall ever come near me. I will keep the name you give me sacredly unsullied. I will never show my face in the world, never ask for a penny of your money; but in mercy spare me the shame, and degradation, and horror of living as your wife in any other sense than that of your name."

She stopped here, with her face covered with clothes and tears, and Colonel St. George rose fiercely and angrily from her.

"You forget," he said, "that, after such an avowal, you leave me no other alternative but to take this man's life, or to lose my honor. Comply, finish your confession—who is he for whom you, another man's wife, dare to proclaim your love in such bold and unblushing terms to myself. I can guess, but I need my predictions confirmed."

"I will save my cousin the effort," said Captain Marsh, advancing a step forward, with a resolute air; "it is I, sir, and I am at your orders."

"You shall hear from me with the least possible delay," Sir George answered the other, white and quivering with rage.

"No," said Captain Marsh, firmly; "it will not be necessary that you should write. I can give you the satisfaction you demand, although duelling is as little in accordance with my principles as you just now pretended it was with yours. Nina must be in your house and satisfied of your intention, the announcement of your marriage must already be at the Times office awaiting insertion, and then I will meet you on the ground. You will have an opportunity of shooting at me if you like. Until then I refuse to place my life at any risk—for her sake."

"Are you a coward by any chance?" inquired Colonel St. George, with insulting coolness.

Cyril smiled.

"I have seen some hot work in the Sikh war," he answered; "I have fought for every step of property which I now own in the Punjaub, and I do not might to face a deceitful enemy whose knife was at my throat, whilst two others guarded my door to prevent escape. I encountered him single-handed, armed with an unchapped revolver, purely and simply because I was not afraid. I can't have altered so much since that time as to be afraid to face one man in broad daylight, with equal arms."

But he paused suddenly and smiled again.

"If you had called me a fool, Colonel St. George, you would have spoken the truth. I have just been guilty of a piece of folly, doubly sanctified by my promise to the dead."

"At any rate I will take good care to remind you of your promise to me before you attempt folly," said Sir George, haughtily, and he gave a sweeping, insolent bow, which included Mrs. Marsh and Nina, and walked out of the room.

Presently they heard the sound of carriage wheels along the gravel path, and Nina drew a deep breath of relief, involuntarily echoed by Captain Marsh. Mrs. Marsh rose slowly to go to her husband. For a minute or two Cyril was silent. But presently he said, in a tone we please as grave:

"Ought not you to go too, Nina?"

"Where?" she asked, with a sudden, startled look.

"To Mr. Marsh. You could not sleep without having first asked his pardon."

"Oh, Cyril, how can you say so? I don't think I could bear any unkindness."

"Can't you imagine what his feelings are now, Nina? and all your own wounded pride with your errors, you should not stay at any sacrifice that could bring him peace of mind. Supposing he should refuse you his forgiveness at first? What would you do? Would you patiently wait you have proved yourself repentant by act as well as by word, and then you may be sure that he will not continue obdurate long. You will be forgiven, pained and annoyed him both in his affection and his pride; do not hesitate before the small atonement in your power."

"If I go to his room, will you wait for me outside?" said Nina, timidly.

Cyril gave her his own wish it."

"Then I will go."

She went resolutely when once her decision was made. And Cyril, perhaps, also followed to the door, but Cyril put his cold palm over her tremulous fingers, turned the handle for her, and then retreated quickly into the shade, leaving her to enter alone.

It was a long time before Mr. Marsh would listen to her words, or look at her. But her attitude was so humble, her face so haggard and worn, that at last his heart melted towards her. He turned round, his eyes softening a little, and bade her rise from her knees.

"Now, Nina," he said, firmly, "tell me how all this happened."

And she told him candidly how, during her stay at Mrs. Marsh's house she had frequently met Colonel St. George, how a sudden fancy—I spring up between them, which Miss Mervyn, with natural and sympathetic, had nourished in every way in her power, believing it to be desirable from any point of view.

"Mind that woman never enters our house again," said Mr. Marsh, parenthetically to his wife, who stood trembling behind his chair.

Then she went on to describe the secret marriage, which had shocked them both when first proposed, but which Colonel St. George soon succeeded in persuading them would not only be productive of present but expedient too, until at last Miss Mervyn accepted the proposition with delight, and guaranteed to convert Nina to her opinions. Then the poor girl spoke with tears of her own submission to her lover's wishes, and of that solemn promise that in a month, at the utmost, he would acknowledge her openly as his wife. His cruel and unfeeling desertion afterwards she did not dwell upon. Mr. Marsh knew that already. But she did venture to describe all her own despair and misery during the interval, and her terrible struggles when a new, real love came to her and showed her plainly the falseness of the old.

"Why was it not told me of your marriage?" inquired Mr. Marsh, when she paused.

"Miss Mervyn—"

"And it was not solemnized—?"

"In the church of Rainworth, Westmoreland, on the 5th of November, at seven o'clock in the morning."

Mr. Marsh asked several other questions, and Cyril had walked up and down the hall for a full hour before Nina came out again.

"If he forgives me," she said, in a tone of deep sadness.

"Well," answered Cyril, surprised, "is it not a great relief to you that he does?"

"No, I don't think it is. I feel that I have gained his pardon under false pretences, for I am not truly sorry."

"Nina, what have you kept back?" inquired Cyril, sternly.

"Have I which I will never tell to any human being whilst I have my senses," she answered with firmness.

He had hoped that we had got to the end of all these mysteries and entanglements, Nina. Good-nesse knows, they have brought us all enough misery. And you thought that you would have been glad to feel that you might be candid and natural once more; but I am afraid that the habit of deceit, from being necessary, has now become pleasant."

"Don't be harsh to me, Cyril, I have suffered so, she said, so pitifully that Cyril felt ashamed of his own words. "Perhaps my conscience is deadened, but my feelings are not, unfortunately. I wish they were. It seems to be my fate to have only disagreeable sensations. Now this position he offers me was once my sole hope and ambition, and I need to think that if I could once be assured of his love and esteem I could be happy with such a care in the world; and now this assurance is not only valueless, but it is the most bitter agony I could have. I am sure you must pity me that you have been granted just as I had begun to pray that it might be for ever denied."

"Then, Nina, let your new prayer be that God will help you to build a better future on the ashes of a miserable past, and that this fate which seems to you as a curse, may, by repentance and patience, be transformed into a blessing. One separation seems very cruel now, but it would be far more cruel if there were no heaven for us both to win, and to meet after. If we can secure an eternity of bliss in return for a few swift years of misery, we shall not have much to complain of."

Nina looked up at him as he added with great tenderness, "go to bed, and rest, at say rate, if you cannot sleep. I will ask Madeleine to let me have a cup of tea for you immediately, and Mrs. Trent shall bring it to your room. Try both my remedies, and you will feel stronger to-morrow. Good-night!"

He kissed her cold hand affectionately, but still in a way that showed he had not forgotten that she was another man's wife; and then they parted for the night.

CEDAR CREEK AND MIDDLETOWN.

On page 116 will be found two spirited sketches, illustrating the recent splendid victory achieved by Major-Gen. Sheridan, in the valley of the Shenandoah. The engagement occurred on the 19th Oct. On the morning of th at day, the rebels, under Gen. Early, attacked our forces at Cedar creek. The attack was made at about daylight, under cover of a fog, and was a complete surprise. It opened on the left flank of the line which was held by the 6th corps. Our troops, including the 6th and 19th corps, fought bravely, but were repulsed and driven from the field. Sheridan's own terse and graphic account of the affair states that "most of the line was driven in confusion, but the troops rallied and fought with the greatest stubbornness on his way back from Washington, whither he had been on a short visit. The news of the disaster met him at Winchester, from which point he immediately set forth to reach his army. At 4 o'clock in the p. m. he came upon the field, somewhat of his escort. He found his retreating forces between Middletown and Newtown, about four miles back from their original position. His arrival inspired the soldiers with new courage and energy, and entirely changed the character of the day. The line of battle was immediately reformed; and, riding along from front, Sheridan told his men that he intended to return to his former position before night. Gen. Wright began the battle of Middletown, which, for brilliancy of dash and vigor of conduct, has no parallel in the history of the war. Gen. Merritt's cavalry on the great right of Murfreesboro, under Gen. Rosecrans. It commenced at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and at three o'clock a general charge was made along the whole line, which resulted in the total rout of the enemy. We first found the rebels leaving upwards of 1,000 prisoners in our hands, together with 24 guns. At the latter, 24 more, all our own, which had been taken by the rebels in the morning. On the left flank, Gen. Custer's division swept in their right and confusion. Ten battle flags have been sent to Sheridan's headquarters. Besides these they will remain as trophies of his splendid victory. His grateful and admiring countrymen, however, treat no trophies to remind them of his valor and energy and indomitable spirit.

The first of our sketches represents the surprising of our forces at Cedar creek. The rebel position here is at "Bellegrove," on the left. Their battle lines extend to the right, where Gen. Early appears in the centre. On the right are the North mountains. Our troops are represented rallying on the left, at the 6th and 19th corps on the right.

Our second sketch represents the gallant charge of the 6th corps, commanded by Gen. Getty, which was made at about four o'clock in the afternoon of the 19th. It was this which decided the battle. The charge was made in face of a deadly and terrible fire from the rebel batteries, under which our men only slightly wavered, though they never for an instant gave way. The battle ground is that described in our sketch, lying at the foot of the Cedar Ridge. The rebel position is on the right, sheltered by a stone fence. That of the 6th corps is similarly protected on the left.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

THE RECRUITING OFFICER.—The reader must imagine a big-bellied, shorthaired recruiting officer, with a fuzz top hat, tight fitting frock-coat, a short sword, nine uniform a size too small, and a row-cancer-ous-looking "mustache" with a bloated gray coat. The officer was after recruits for a German regiment, and thus went at it for his susceptible countryman:

"Lo! dere, Hans, be dat you?

"Yaw!"

"Come me to be eafer man?"

"Nein!"

"Nein! comes it be so nice."

"Nein! I says, I don't."

"Nein! Fy tam, it is better as good. It ben from all de time. You eafter mit me you get vein hundred dollars komsish."

"Vat?"

"Yaw. And in the morning, ven de trump pots, dat is de gurnel's compliments to come at! gif your schapes mit him!"

"Vat?"

"Yaw! So gout!"

"Yaw! You go mit me?"

"Yes!"

Two college cronies (call them Tom and Ned):

On Sabbath morning sought the house of prayer,
To hear a parson, who, they said,
Gave promise of a talent rather rare.
At service time the youthful Ned,
Or second Summerfield, obtained the Word:
Intent, he seemed, as this it all in all—
The poorest sermon that he ever heard.
Returning homeward, Tom was first to speak:
"Now I guess we may agree
I never thought the man could be so weak!
I did not think he'd preach for years and years!"
"Why, then he didn't preach at all!" said Ned.
"Well, he shows the truth (quoth Tom) of what he said!"

A SCRUB-HEADED boy having been brought before the Mayor as a witness, the following colloquy ensued:

"Have you ever been at home?" said the Judge.

"I've with mother."

"Where else but at mother live?"

"She lives with father."

"Where does he live?"

"He lives with the old folks."

"Where do the old folks live?" says the Judge getting very red, as an audible snicker goes round the room.

"They lives to home."

"Where in thunder's their home?" roars the Judge.

"I starts to home from from," says the boy, sticking his tongue in a corner of his mouth and looking out sly on the Judge.

"Here, sir, Constable," says the Court, "take the witness out and tell him to travel; he evidently does not understand the western circuit."

"You'd think different," says the boy, going towards the doorway, "if I was once to give you a canter!"

EVENING COMFORTS

1. To the Bi-boking—Comfort yourself by the reflection that the handsomest man is very generally blockhead.

2. To the tobacco-smoker—Console yourself for the evils you inherit with the smoke of your pipe by the knowledge that you might be one-half a dyspeptic strong liquor, one-tenth as unwholesome as gluttony, nor one-hundredth as fatal as gambling.

3. To the lady of a certain age—What a prodigious amount of consolation you have in your rosary pot.

4. To the man without leg—Be happy in the knowledge that you are exempt from corns and bunions.

5. To the individual who is suffering under the conviction that he is a fool—Dress for our supper.

6. To the gentleman who is bald—Take pleasure in the reflection that you are a philosopher.

7. To the individual who is reduced to his last dollar—Breathe over the extatic thought that you still have the price of a dinner and a whisky-skin in your breeches pocket.

LOVE SONG.

By an African Traveller.

My Mary Jane, I think of you,
Though far in foreign lands I roam,
For birthplace full of love, you,
The vast gorilla's native home!

My Mary Jane, of you I think,
When silent reigns the moonlight set and fair:
When bone, gobbled in the kitchen,
Pase roaring by my hunting lair!

My Mary Jane, I think of you,
Absence my passion cannot stale,
Love's joy I feel, though you be two
As surely as my trusty rifle!

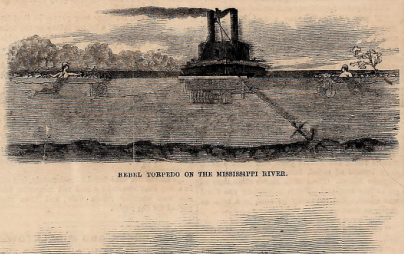
And, Mary Jane, if e'er the word
Is spoke that I absolve forget,
May I by Yaks and Elands gored,
Be trampled down to death by Quaggas!

Turn following from a Scotch paper shows to what pitch of perfection etiquette has attained in the north. A minister was in the habit of calling on a certain family and said in an under tone: "Why don't you say a grace before meat?" "That's just what I'm trying to do, father," was the reply.

The darkest scene we ever saw, says a contemporary, was a darkey in a dark cellar, with an extinguished candle, looking for a black cat that wasn't there!

The rebel raider Wheeler is only twenty-five years old and very cruel. He is a Rebel man. At a ball in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, just before the war, he got tight, and becoming aware that the ladies were turning up their noses at him, he sallied out with the cry: "Wheeler you're drunk! Wheeler, the girls are laughing at you! Wheeler, you'd better go home!" And he did.

SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN IN GEORGIA.—U. S. SOLDIERS, AT ATLANTA, GA., TEARING DOWN BUILDINGS SHATTERED DURING THE LATE BOMBARDMENT.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.



THE CAMPAIGN IN GEORGIA.

Rebel Citizens Leaving Atlanta—Union Troops Tearing Down Shattered Houses.

We publish two very interesting sketches from our Special Artist with Sherman's Army, which illustrate the harsh side of war. The expulsion of the rebel inhabitants, although loudly denounced by secessionists, and in some instances disapproved by their Northern sympathisers, was absolutely indispensable to the safety of the Union army, as they would have been a nest of spies and active opponents in the event of any crisis. This was rendered the more imperative, since it was necessary to hold Atlanta as a military stronghold, and not merely as a conquered city. With the usual generosity of the Union Generals to their enemies, Gen. Sherman permitted the inhabitants to carry off all their household goods and other personal effects, hauling them Union wagons to transport them 16 miles into the rebel lines, concessions never yet made by the Confederates when they have obtained possession of any Union town.

Our Artist has represented the motley group as they appeared on the morning of their exodus, and it strikingly shows how terrible has been the price paid by the Seceded States for their dream of guilty ambition. But a glance at our picture renders description unnecessary.

The other sketch gives our readers a graphic idea of how much the city was damaged by our occasional fire, and shows how little able it would have been to withstand a bombardment, even had not Gen. Sherman, by his admirable strategy, rendered that extremity needless. As some of the houses were in a dangerous condition, the General ordered them to be pulled down.

STOCKADE FORT

At Chattahoochee Bridge.

THE Chattahoochee river crosses Gen. Sherman's line, from Chattanooga to Atlanta, at a place called Vining, about 12 miles west from the latter city. There is a bridge at this point, protected by a stockade fort, as represented in the illustration on this page, from a sketch by our Special Artist. It is the custom to guard every bridge on the line with such a fort, which is very strongly built, and able to withstand a considerable force. There are several of them between Chattanooga and Atlanta, which are of material value in preserving the line of communication unbroken

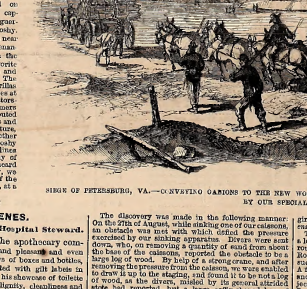
CONVEYING CAPTIONS



To the New Position in front of Petersburg.

THE approach of our forces towards Petersburg is slow and gradual, but steady and sure. On the 17th of October our lines were advanced, the 2d corps being in position. A sketch on this page, made by our Special Artist, represents the conveyance of guns to that position. The gabion is used for purposes of defense. It is a cylindrical in form, and is somewhat larger than a common barrel. It is made of steel rods, running round the end, which are arranged just as barrel staves are, the process being to stick them in the ground, and weave together with pliable twigs of hickory, ash or other suitable green wood. When erected in the line of the fortification, the gabion is filled with earth. It is a peculiarly effectual protection against rifle shot, and is much used to guard embrasures in forts.

CAPTURE OF A WAGON TRAIN

By Mosby's Guerillas.

A SPIRITED sketch by our Special Artist is presented on this page, representing the capture of a wagon train by rebel guerillas, under the command of Mosby. The capture was recently made near Ripon, in the valley of the Shenandoah. Mosby has long been the pest of this region. His favorite scouting ground is in Loudon and Fairfax counties, Virginia. The place of rendezvous for his guerillas is near Manassas Gap, sometimes at Fredericksburg, and sometimes at Rectortown. His men are chiefly farmers residents in that region. When routed and pursued they break separates and make away, thus eluding capture, but it is speedily summoned together again, hastily by a courier. Mosby is disliked to serve against the lines of communication of the Army of the Potomac. He was lately driven of near Alexandria, but is now, we believe, operating on the line of the Alexandria and Orange railroad, at a point further south.

CAMP SCENES.

Army Drug Store—The Hospital Steward.

IN our cities and towns the apothecary commonly occupies a handsome and pleasant and even elegant quarters. His neat rows of boxes and bottles, uniform in size, and ornamented with gilt labels in abbreviated Latin, and with his showcase of toilette articles, tastely at once to the dignity, cleanliness and taste of his vocation. In the summer, too, he adds a new charm to his dispensary by erecting the white marble counter of the fountain, precious to thirsty and thoroughly unctuous ale. One might imagine that there would be a good deal of bitterness in the cup of the druggist; but there is, in fact, only this single drawback—he hails to be awakened at any hour of the night, and summoned to quench the craving of some importunate seeker after drugs and medicines. The position of the city apothecary, however, is fixed by itself compared with that of his compeer in the army. A stretch on page 117 represents his office at his post of duty. His office is that of Hospital Steward, and he is the doctor's assistant. Whenever a soldier needs medicine he gets a prescription from the doctor, and goes to present to the Hospital Steward, who gives him the required dose. Our sketch represents the Steward in his tastily improvised tent, contrasting strongly with the spacious and elegant quarters of the city apothecary, preparing medicine for a sick soldier. Behind the Steward is the chest of drugs, which is ordinarily kept in a wagon. On the table are gallipots and glasses. The accessories are appropriate to a scene in a camp life.

THERE is said to be a man in the moon. In the honeymoon there are both a man and a woman.

REMARKABLE DISCOVERY IN ENGLAND.

THE Liverpool (England) Mercury contains a letter from Mr. J. P. Ashton, agent of the contractors for the iron work of the bridge crossing the Mersey, at Runcorn, Lancashire, giving an account of the discovery of a human body, in a most excellent state of preservation, which must have lain in the peat of Cosh for 1,400 years. We add the account given by Mr. Ashton:

"The discovery was made in the following manner: On the 27th of August, while making one of our caissons, an obstacle was met with which defied the pressure exercised by our sinking apparatus. Divers were sent down, who, on removing a quantity of sand from about the base of the caisson, reported the obstacle to be a large log of wood. By help of a strong crane, and after removing the pressure from the caisson, we were enabled to draw it up to the staging, and found it to be not a log of wood, as the divers, misled by its general shrivelled state, had reported, but a large coffin-shaped box of great strength, measuring about eight feet by three.

"The wood had become impregnated with oxide of iron from the red sandstone, which had made it as hard as iron itself, so that it was with the greatest difficulty that we were enabled to pry open the lid. The inside, which was roughly hewn to the shape of a human body, with a large additional space at the head, was lined with a greyish bituminous substance, and contained the body of a man in a most wonderful state of preservation. It is stained in the dress of a wealthy Roman citizen, the tunic and togs both white, embroidered with purple and gold threads, the togs fastened with a handsome gold fibula. The straps of the buskins are studded with little golden bosses. Attached to the same I have described, and am about to describe."

In the sepulchre, besides a large number of ornaments of gold and silver, such as were worn by Saxon females of rank, among the articles of female lockets, containing a long tress of glossy yellow hair. The ornaments appear to be of a female who had longed to one person, and this fact, coupled with the presence of the hair, leads to the belief that the subject contained in the urn to be those of the owner both of them and the hair

The sarphous also contains a small pocket of coins, nearly 100 in number, of which 4 are gold, 3 of the reigns of the Roman Emperors; Honorius, dating an. 410, a few of Hadrian, Antoninus and Severus, with earlier dates. The remaining coins are silver, probably Saxon, but owing to their rust and their defaced condition I am unable to say positively. On only six a date visible, viz., 468

From these dates, as well as from the Saxon ornaments, I am inclined to refer the remains to about the date of the first arrival of the Saxons in Britain. The corpse may be that of one of the lieutenants of Horse to this island, or as history speaks of no political intercourse between Rome and our island at that time, he may have been connected with a religious, not a civil, mission. The ashes, I surmise to be those of a Saxon female. But how shall we account for the presence of the remains of a Roman and a Saxon in a common tomb? More strange still is the embalming of the Roman and the cremation of the Saxon. The position of the coffin in the bed of the river is also strange; but an overturned boat and the shifting sands may account for that. Possibly the scroll found in the urn may give an explanation of this, and till this has been deciphered we must be content to remain in the dark.

HOW A PHILOSOPHER LIVED.

IN a recent number of the Cornhill Magazine we find this account of the private life of Kant:

"Kant lived in a modest and retired house, in a quiet street, behind the old palace. Winter and summer, the old soldier, who was his servant, came into his bedroom at five o'clock in the morning, and said, 'It is time.' The philosopher rose instantly with wonderful rapidity, and by five was seated at his breakfast-table, where he took a cup of coffee, nothing more, smoked a pipe and collected his ideas for the work of the day. He never went out for his lectures, and on returning set to work till a quarter to nine.

"Precisely at the quarter he dressed for dinner, took a glass of wine to excite his appetite, and was ready for the guests whom he had invited. He never dined alone, and always breakfasted alone. Dinner was the time when he liked to receive his friends. At his breakfast he was so much accustomed to solitude that when once a friend dropped in at that hour and asked a chair to his meal, Kant was embarrassed, and ended by asking his friend to sit where he could not see him, saying that for more than half a century he had never seen a soul near him while he drank his tea in the morning. But at dinner he could not bear to be left to himself. He always took care to invite some of his friends beforehand, and one day, when none of them could come, he sent his servant into the street to pick up the first passer-by and bring him in to dinner. He could not bear to be kept waiting. For this reason he dissolved ceremony at table, and his most agreeable guest was the one who took a dish without offering it to others, so that the turn of the host came the more quickly.

"It must be remembered that Kant had eaten nothing all the morning, and had been working steadily. Dining usually two hours or more, and was a very pleasant meal, the great metaphysician talking in a simple and popular style on subjects of the day, generally on politics, of which he was a diligent reader. His passion for them was such that he sometimes flung himself eagerly on the newspapers in the morning, which one would have thought a profanation; for his study was a sanctuary sacred to intellectual labors, and nothing was more sure to disturb it. Not till the guests had quitted the study and entered dining-room and Kant was his colloquing gravely.

"After dinner he took his regular walk up and down a small alley of limes, which is called the Philosopher's Alley. His walk was always solitary, except on rainy and blustering days, when he was not followed by even a man with a smoke under his arm, and with a restless and vigilant look, an exact image of Providence. Kant had two reasons for walking alone—he wanted to think, and he did not want to give his servant the trouble of that by breathing through his nose the air could be admitted only through the mouth, and he held it a habit of taking cold. On coming home he read the papers. In the evening he made notes for lectures, or wrote a letter to a friend, and meditated on what he read, or for his own amusement. Before he began to write down any ideas that occurred to him, he was wont to dwell a moment or two in silence, and almost suspended all occupations, and closed his eyes. He bedeckoned his slight servant when sleeping. His bedroom was never heated, the windows were always half open, summer and winter, and the light was carefully excluded as the air."

THE OUT-TRAVELLED TRAVELLER.—A traveller came very late for his breakfast, and the meal was hurriedly prepared. A young man eating the chops was not quite up to the mark made all sorts of apologies around the table, and worked away in great haste, leaving his meal beyond the affirmative influence of his fork, or by any acknowledging even the presence of his host. This was a remarkable case, and roused the landlord, who changing the range of his battery, such his shirt to be his avocation, exclaimed:

"Now, mister, confound me if I hain't made all the apologies around, and more, for you to come late to breakfast and who gets it, and I tell you I have seen further, more crookeder, than the end of a eight months' breakfast than this several times."

The young man's head had down his tools, swallowed the bite in transitu, and modestly looking up to the fuming landlord, replied:

"In what you say true?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, then, I'll be blamed if you hain't out-travelled me."

MR. A. OAKEY HALL read a paper before the New York Horticultural Society, showing, among other things, some statistics which had taken place in New York since 1664. He referred to the fact that cows were then driven to the Park street, which is now. He is full of bulls now. The change is not remarkable.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Watches, Jewellery and Jewellery intended for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and we are thus enabled to offer them.

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO. acting as Agents for the Importers, have determined to have received upon a Great Gift Distribution, subject to the following regulations:

CERTIFICATES, naming each article and its value, are placed in SEALED ENVELOPES, and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents.

ALL ARTICLES SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE!

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are going to get, and if it is not worth more than one dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may have the choice of obtaining a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any article in Gazelly Brothers' list for ONE DOLLAR, and in no case can they get more than One Dollar's worth, as there are no blanks. The price of Certificates is as follows:

One for	25 cents.
Eleven for	$2
Thirty for	$5
Sixty for	$10
One hundred for	$15

Agents will find this a splendid thing to sell. Every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents will send 26 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps. ARRANDALE & CO.,

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

is a PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years e nvinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is reduced as a matter of doctring; any invalid using it will save nothing from being sick. It is not better to pay three dollars a year to keep sickness away, than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the incovenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York physician says that one dollar spent in trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained one patient who will continue to use it for life. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in this city has used it for Dyspepsia and Constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $2 per bottle (full quart). For sale everywhere. Sent by Express on receipt of price. All orders should be addressed to

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of superior liquors, and when domestic compounds purporting to be medicine, but not a word less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. To know them, that while all the deceptive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Yankee combinations alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing crude or fusel oil, a special poison: HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essences of Herbs with the pure juice of the most valuable stomachic, anti-bilious and aperient herbs and plants, and with a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its hideous complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other articles advertised in the United States, and the secret is, the ingredients which entermingle its usefulness are signed by millions of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of deleterious and impure articles.

A NEW VERSION OF BYRON.

Know ye the stove that is crowded by ladies—
The pinched and freckled of every clime—
Where that Soap, called ITALIAN, so exquisite made is,
That to use it not may be considered a crime?
Know ye the store where the Egyptian Sculptor
Takes a cake or halves or halves to hand, as they find
That the Stain from their brows and their lips has departed,
And they no longer need to be decolete hearts?
Where the mountain rich fragrance exhales, while she tarries,
From perfumes of Lubin and Guerlin of Paris:
Where the LIVE WIRES and the LIQUID MAIN DRY,
In order, their varied, in beauty may vie,
And the tints of the Rouge even rubbing defy?
Where the mirrors are large, and the showcases fine:
And everything breathes an air almost divine?
Yes! 'tis the Emporium of GOURAUD, celebrated,
And well ye may smile for the deeds he has done!
All Ills that the human flesh heir to, he has quelled,
Are the praises they bear, and the Cream they can tell!
To the purchaser's call for the Oriental Preparations for beautifying the human person is the best proof of his success.

Found at GOURAUD'S New Depot, 453 Broadway, and Druggists generally.

CELEBRATION OF THE ABOLITION OF NEGRO SLAVERY IN MARYLAND, AT PHILADELPHIA, PENN., NOV. 1.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR PHILADELPHIA ARTIST.

SLAVERY ABOLISHED IN MARYLAND.

Grand Celebration of the Event in Philadelphia.

The Legislature of Maryland, at its last session, authorized and directed the calling of a Convention to form a new Constitution for that State. In due time that Convention assembled at Baltimore, being, of course, composed of delegates elected by the people; and in due time that Convention submitted to the people a new Constitution abolishing negro slavery within the limits of Maryland. This instrument was subsequently accepted by popular vote, and took effect on the 1st of November. The event was celebrated in Baltimore and in other cities. A sketch on our first page illustrates the celebration at Philadelphia, which was conducted by the supervisory Committee for recruiting colored troops. The entire front of their building in Chestnut street was ablaze with gas—was illuminated on the night of the 1st inst., and adorned with transparencies, illustrating the progress of the Emancipation movement during the civil war, as also the achievements of our colored troops. The effect was exceedingly brilliant. Addresses were made on the occasion. Private houses in the city were also illuminated. During the day there was a parade of the 41st regiment of U. S. colored troops, commanded by Col. Louis Wagner. In the evening all the colored churches of the city were opened for religious services. Thus the colored portion of Philadelphia rejoiced over the great fact that Maryland is a free State.

MARYLAND.

BY JENNIE K. GRIFFITH.

Fiercer ocean unto oceanis roll;
From the Lakes to the Pole,
Far as our wide possessions reach,
From Mexico to Maine's wild beach,
From every home the whole land through,
From every church and schoolhouse, too,
Proclaim that Maryland is free!
Dear Maryland!

She did but sleep while others woke,
But saintly visions on her broke,
An angel through her light hath spoke,
Dear Maryland!

Oh, Rocky Mountains, ponder rise,
Tell the glad tidings to the skies,
Let the wild winds catch the refrain
And sing it far and wide again,
Run, Mississippi, on thy course,
With thunder's march mark thy far source,
Beat with thy strong pulse's mighty force
For Maryland!

Burst into bloom, prairie land,
Join, cities, hand in hand,
Toss thy white caps from strand to strand
For Maryland!

Tell all the white-winged ships that sail
Ocean, tell every tropic gale,
What means the bonfire from fort to fort,
Comet, thou, and pay thy loyal court.
Break into great throbs at her feet,
Let her heart fill full heart's beat,
And sit exalted in her seat,
Blessed Maryland!

O wise men, from the breaking morn,
A princess to our love is born,
Bring spice and gifts her to adorn,
Blessed Maryland!

We love her feet, her hands we kiss—
Dear land, to a deed like this!—
While, soft and slender, yet they broke
The driver's strong and hoodman's yoke!
Jerusalem, sing with loud acclaim,
Link all sweet phrases with her name,
Bring harp and, harps, bright bonfire flame
For Maryland!

Oh, smiling vineyards, flushed with wine,
Broad fields of corn in serried line,
Orains golden as the ore from mine,
For Maryland!

Pour freely all thy treasures out,
Be glad, O Earth, with gleeful shout.
No hopeless tears shall wet thy breast,
No hopeless heart ask thee for rest.
Bring out our mother's robes of state,
Fair maids of the Republic, wait,
Frond staters, harpy and date,
On Maryland!

Republican in court and hovel,
We name her Princess, as whom art,
Born to our tenderest love apart,
Our Maryland!

WOODSTOCK, Ohio, May 20, 1863.

Sirs:—Having had occasion to use Perry Davis's Pain Killer in my family for the last five years, I am pleased to acknowledge its beneficial effects in every instance. Feeling confident that it was this medicine that saved my child's life, when attacked with Croup lately, it is a pleasure to me to recommend it as a good family medicine, and one which every family ought to have in their house. In cases of Croup there can be nothing better; at least, I have always found it so, and I find it to be generally known and esteemed.

Yours respectfully,
H. P. MCKEENAN.

Will the Rebels Arm and Liberate their Slaves to Fight for Slavery?

If his been semi-officially announced from Richmond that Jefferson Davis and his Confederate rulers have determined upon the desperate expedient of arming and drilling, for the spring campaign, the formidable auxiliary force of 200,000 negro slaves. Whether they can be bought over to this extraordinary service of fighting for slavery by the offer to each man of the boon of his personal freedom, with the promise of 50 acres of land at the close of the war. The masters concerned, for the loss of their valuable slave property, are to be indemnified in "Confederate Scrip."

The plan is the scheme of the dispassionate and intelligent reader, it may seem incredible and preposterous, beyond all bounds of belief; but it is seriously discussed and advocated by the Richmond journals and, among the leading Southern politicians, Virginia to Louisiana. They contend that the thing is feasible and advisable; that Southern independence is worth even the sacrifice demanded, and that the gift of the individual freedom and 50 acres of land will secure their black soldier against all the temptations of the Yankees. Absurd, ludicrous, insane and suicidal, therefore, as the project may appear, under the lights of experience and the reasoning of common sense, we are constrained to treat it as a movement seriously contemplated by that remarkable plutocracy and despotism of liberty, Jeff Davis. We are the more disposed to this treatment with his confession before us that, with Richmond invested by Gen. Grant, and the imminent danger, and with Georgia and all the States below threatened with subjugation by Gen. Sherman, two-thirds of the white soldiers of "the Confederacy" are deserters or "absent without leave," while more of the remaining whites at home are capable of bearing arms.

We will assume, therefore, that Davis has seriously considered this scheme of arming the slaves to fight for slavery, and has resolved to try the experiment. The question then recurs, how will it work? Let us briefly inquire from the facts before us and the lessons of experience.

First—300,000 able-bodied male slaves are to be armed and prepared as soldiers of Davis for the spring campaign. His Confederacy is now reduced to 6,000,000 of souls, of which about 2,500,000 are negro slaves. Deduct from this number 300,000 able-bodied men, in addition to those employed as army teamsters, etc., in the field, and there will be not he an able-bodied negro male left to plough the fields, and plant the corn, beans and potatoes, in the spring, upon which the armies and the people of "the Confederacy" depend to save themselves from starvation.

Our first conclusion, therefore, is that Davis, so far from being able to muster 300,000 negro soldiers for the spring campaign, cannot raise even 50,000 or 20,000, because in the spring the services of all his negroes will be needed to raise bread for "the Confederacy." From the scarcity of horses and mules, and from the great general blow will he required next spring in preparing Southern lands for corn than ever before, or, in other words, more able-bodied negroes.

Secondly.—We consider this maximum as experience has shown that the Southern slave seizes invariably the first "fair chance" to escape to the Yankees, singly, or in twos, tens and hundreds, and that he will not be trusted in armed gangs of hundreds and thousands, with that mockery of the heon of freedom which still consigns his wife and children to slavery, and with 50 acres of land in the mountains of the moon.

Thus much for the slaves. We now come to slaveholders. How will they receive this scheme of bringing these slaves into the field as soldiers of Southern independence?

First.—We hold that they will decide that this scheme inevitably involves the abolition of slavery, and that a Southern Confederacy without slavery is not worthy use to them.

Secondly.—That it is useless to fight for the abolition of slavery, when they can have it peacefully, and avoid all further spoliations of the war, and all the horrors of a servile insurrection of armed and isciplined blacks, by the simple act of submission to the Union.

Thirdly.—That with "Confederate scrip" reduced by the war to the dollar, payment in such trash to the slaveholders for his slave property, seized as food for powder, would be downright swindling with the additional loss, perhaps, of that 50 acres of land for each negro taken away; and that, accordingly, the general voice of the rebel slaveholders will be emphatic and decisive against this proposition to despoil them at once of their slaves, their lands and their Confederacy, and in behalf of a cause which is already lost.

Such are our views of the working of this preposterous scheme of liberating the slaves to fight for slavery in behalf of a tottering Confederacy; this scheme of knocking "the Confederacy" on the head to secure Southern independence. It will fail at both ends. The slaves cannot be taken from the hoe, and cannot he trusted with the bayonet. The masters having sacrificed everything else to protect their institution of slavery, will not sacrifice their slaves to protract the vain struggle of Davis to save himself "in this last ditch." We are rather inclined to consider the agitation of this scheme at Richmond as an ingenious method of announcing to the slaveholders concerned that their cause is gone, and that Davis would like to have their influence in favor of giving up "the Confederacy" in disgust.

Summary of the Week.

MISSOURI.

The rout of Sterling Price has been more complete than was at first supposed. His intention was undoubtedly to affect the approaching State election, and to announce in that perspective immediately be ascertained, but so far as the military success is concerned it has been a total failure.

The latest intelligence is that the Union forces, having scattered the rebel army, were in close cavalry pursuit of the broken and dispirited remnants of Sterling Price's army. It is, however, difficult to calculate upon the endurance of an army constituted as this is, half guerilla and half Western.

Their last rally was in Newton county, in the south-western corner of the State. That Price's army is regarded by our military authorities as powerless for future operations is evinced by the fact that Gen. Andrew J. Smith's corps is retiring towards the eastern portion of the State, marching by two columns, one on each side of the Missouri river, for the purpose of sweeping the country completely clean of the rebels.

KENTUCKY.

Preparations have been made to receive the threatened invasion of the rebels, who, it was said, were about to cross the river at Bridgeport, Ala., and march northward, while Forrest attacked Johnsonville. It is certain that the rebels are concentrating their forces for an attack in this direction.

SHENANDOAH.

There has been no movement of any importance since last week. Scouts inform Gen. Sheridan that the rebel Gen. Early is at Newmarket, reorganizing the remnants of his old army, and such operations as have been made to it by the Richmond authorities.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The Richmond papers announce the taking of Plymouth by the Union troops, after a spirited resistance. They attribute the fall of the town to the absence of the rebel ram Albemarle, of whose destruction by Lieut. Cushing they were so ignorant. Full particulars concerning it was a most brilliant one, and is illustrated and fully described in another part of our paper.

TENNESSEE.

A gang of guerillas made an attack on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad at Cave City on Thursday, and killed and captured several soldiers and negroes. After which they retired with all dispatch.

The day after the raid on the railroad Gen. Hood made his first attempt to cross the Tennessee river, between Decatur and Florence, at the head of the Muscle Shoals of the Tennessee. The movement of putting the rebels over was repulsed with great loss. The correspondent of the New York Herald says that Gen. Sherman has made the city of Decatur, Decatur, to operate against Hood, while he is marching with the other four to Atlanta, to assume offensive operations against the enemy.

VIRGINIA.

Our troops before Petersburg and Richmond are busily employed in making log huts for their winter quarters.

A Petersburg despatch in a Richmond paper says:

On the night of the 1st Nov. Grant drew in his cavalry pickets on the extreme left, below Reams's station, and left a strong line of infantry picket line a mile in the rear of his army, in the vicinity of Petersburg, as if to cover some movement."

NAVAL.

Lieut. Harris, commanding the army gunboat Maswood, attached to Gen. Graham's naval brigade, had made a reconnoissance up the Nansemond river, and captured a rebel Major and a squad of men.

TOWN COSSIP.

POLITICS! nothing but politics. Through all this week not a sensation has rested upon the public mind but the approaching election. Men met for every recurring theme. Torchlight processions and mass-meetings for supper, and public meetings for dinner, and protracted argument for breakfast. Charles Sumner and Wendell Phillips at Cooper Institute hooting forth to thousands what they term, and George B. McClellan looking forth from the balcony of the 5th Avenue Hotel over the tens of thousands of heads of men upon his old command, the men who fought, bled and did everything but die with him, on the now sacred soil of Virginia, and who are upon his side ready to pay him honor. There was something to be remembered for a lifetime in the act of standing on that balcony and looking upon those men who had been his name with the history of a nation. Something in which politics was lost, and we only saw the brilliant and successful soldier. The love they held of Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania, and by his skill saved a nation from destruction and anarchy. With that was mentioned associate politics. The very word is a stain upon his record, and yet he stands now, the entrusted general, by the confidence of a great part of the people, by the magic of his name to achieve a bloodless revolution, and alter the whole governmental action of a great people.

Before this paper reaches the hands of its fair million of readers the election will be over and the verdict given that shall tell us whether for four years more we abide under present rule, or whether the sober second thought of the people will make a change. Never before in the history of the country has so great an issue been involved, and never has such a spirit of bitterness been transpired. There is a calm desperation about the people that tells every one that the time for action has arrived, and that the scenes now being enacted in Dixie who never before felt the responsibility, and quietly perform that duty which, had it been always performed as it should and would have saved us all this lavishing of blood and treasure. Such a vote will be polled as will astonish the politicians of both sides. Andrew Jeff Davis with a large available force of muscle we have still on hand to help wipe him off the face of creation. 120,000 voters have already registered in New York city, and it will be strange if that number does not swell up on election day to at least 130,000, that being by 40 per cent. a greater vote than has ever before been polled.

The quiet movements that have been made by the National Government in New York city within the past few weeks show a distrust of our loyalty. The closing of the Provost Marshal's office, the withdrawal of the guns from the mud in and about the city, the appointment of Gen. Dutter to see to things individually and collectively.

is ominous of fear, but it is fear without a basis. New York is a democratic city, and always will be. The elements of her population make it imperatively so; but she is loyal to the core, and has sealed and is sealing the compact every day with her best blood, and a munificent share of her wondrous wealth. She is for business, heart and soul, and no business community can, upon time for calm deliberation, be in favor of war.

Had New York been asked, at the breaking out of this rebellion, what she would do towards helping on a war of four years duration, she would not have responded by one man or one cent. The result would have appeared to her as total ruin; but having once become embarked in the struggle, she is willing to carry it to the bitter end, though still claiming the privilege of a grumble, a privilege that should be most especially accorded her, if for no other reason than that while some parts of the country—New England for instance—have made money by the war, she has lost fearfully.

There is but one prayer we shall put up, which is, that the election and its approximations will soon be stilled, that we may read something else in all the newspapers than political squibs, heavy leaders, abusive attacks and disgusting misrepresentations, and God finally prosper the right.

To those who are waiting for their winter overcoats, we impart the intelligence, direct from headquarters, that the journeymen tailors have decided to give in, and throw themselves on the magnanimity of the bosses. It has been diamond cut diamond, but as the employers are the richest diamond, it was not difficult to see which way the battle would go if they only had stamina enough to stand it. It is a presumable case that now we shall have our winter overcoats for some slight figure under $200.

We may consider the railroad war as over. The public have calmly settled down into paying the extra penny, and though a few patriotic individuals provide themselves with tickets, and stand upon street corners offering them to would-be-passengers, or proffer them occasionally in the cars, the people hardly care to enter into the controversy, feeling that it is easier to pay the tax than to rebel. We are told by such presses as set up for guardians of the rights of the people, that this rise of one cent is but the preliminary to a demand for ten cents per ride; but we, for one, though not doubting the will of the companies to do it, will wait and submit, until such is the case.

One of the events of the week has been the absconding of a paying-teller, he of the Mercantile Bank, with only $300,000, and his ability, so far—though $20,000 reward has been offered for him—to keep out of the way. This little matter is refreshing, for the simple reason that we have not had an absconding of any consequence for some years, and as a consequence the public had settled down into the belief that virtue reigned triumphant with paying tellers, and all other persons who wear good clothes and live in brown stone fronts.

Of the absconding teller, we are told that "he was such a gentlemanly man." He drove fast horses and kept up a fine establishment at Staten Island, where, no doubt, he entertained many of the old fogy directors and officers of the bank, who, after an evening at his house, and getting comfortably tight—that is, as tight as such highly respectable persons ever get—went away with the set idea that this paying teller was the most genial and reliable man to be found. They knew that he lived at a rate three times beyond his income; but then he lived so well, and had such good wines and drove such excellent horses! Had it been one employer having a clerk, the whole thing would have been out in a month, but in this case the employers were legion, and "what is everybody's business is nobody's business," and so the paying-teller went on until one day the paying-teller and $30-,000 were missing together.

While upon matters hinging upon Wall street, we will say a word about gold. The precious metal has during the week touched 250, closing with the week at 244½. There is a terrible pressure just now to run the price up to 300, and to judge by the roaring and butting of the bulls, the matter may be a success, which will only be another argument to show how completely the people are in the hands of the capitalists and speculators.

Adverting to the military, it is a significant sign that our streets and public places are beginning to fill up with officers and soldiers, the most of them sent home to vote, but the greater part allowed a furlough because the work for the year is over. To those who are privileged to wear shoulder-straps, as well as to the privates, we have a word of advice to offer. It is all comprised in the two words—KEEP CLEAN! It is an error that too many of them fall into, that of going about the streets and into public places unwashed, and with a uniform which, as far as cleanliness goes, could not be touched with a ten foot pole. Most of them do this from the idea that it gives them a veteran look, a soldier tired of war's alarms, coming from the tented field, bringing all his dirt and, perhaps, something else with him. If this is the idea, it is one of great falsity. The world naturally shrinks with repulsion from an ill-dressed and dirty person, and whatever a soldier may gain by sympathy from appearance as a tatterdemalion will be lost through that feeling of repulsion. An officer is especially disgraced who cannot keep himself clean or his uniform neat. If he has not that faculty with himself he cannot make his men keep clean, and if he cannot do that he is unfit to command them. Also, we would caution actors, who sometimes see fit to insult the military portion of their audience by allusions to their presence, and suggestions, in bad wit, that they should rather be in the field. The fact is readily admitted, that the place for a soldier is in the field, but we cannot see why, when duty is slack, the one who has faithfully served, perhaps through the whole year, should not have a chance to be a week or two at home, and, if he chooses, to air his shoulder-strape in public places. We shall make it our business to rebuke publicly any actor who utters a slur of this kind, or any manager who permits it.

Our Amusements.

The time is one of steady prosperity to managers. Everything in the shape of a show, from grand opera up to a three-legged calf, will draw. New York has run theatre mad, and, whether good or bad is offered to its palate, swallows its dramatic food with equal gusto. The habit of theatre-going is very much of the same style as that of whiskey-drinking or newspaper reading; the victim becomes accustomed to a particular bar-room or an especial paper, and his physical or mental taste becomes so hardened by use that he does not detect change. The barkeeper may water or drug his whiskey, or the editor may leave out the spiciness that once gave flavor to his sheet; but the habituated patron still goes on drinking or reading, believing that he is getting precisely the article he received in the past, and enjoying it equally as well. This is the way with our theatres. Instance Wallack's and the Olympic. Instead of progressing with the age, they are steadily retrograding every week, and yet the same familiar faces crowd the seats that we remember in the olden days when something really good was done. The public must go to the theatre, and we hold it to be a sacred duty on the part of the manager, even though his house may be crowded every night, and he has it in his power to fob off old and stupid plays, backed by shabby and worn scenery, and blundered through by stupid sticks, to have sufficient conscience to offer the public his best. The simple truth is that just now there is a flush of money and a desire on the part of the people to amuse themselves and forget their troubles, and the managers are taking advantage of it by offering any trash they can make available. Wallack has revived "Rosedale," cramming it down the throats of his audience without a word of apology. The Olympic has given us for a novelty the "Rose of Castile," minus all the real attraction, and a few stout repetitions of Mortimer in farce.

Can it be possible that there is no dramatic talent in the country? Or is it that managers will not encourage it? We are satisfied that writers will not bestir themselves very heartily over playmaking for the munificent sum of ten dollars per night, but could not some of our successful caterers for the public bring forth a diamond from the New York mine of talent by offering its price? We firmly believe that there is ability, not in the old literary hacks who will knock you off a five act tragedy or comedy in half a day, and demand pay accordingly, and aspire to be called the dramatic authors of America, but in the floating talent that seeks only to be directed into that channel by inducement. The copyright of a good play is worth exactly ten times what any New York manager is at this moment willing to pay for it, and just so long as the ability to write is undervalued so long will the pen lay dormant.

At the Olympic, we have a debutante in the person of Miss Eliza Newton, who certainly has not beauty to recommend her, whatever other quality she may eventually show herself to possess. In figure she is rather inclined to the petite, and in voice lacking strength and indistinct. On her debut she labored under the disadvantage of appearing in boy's clothes, a serious mistake for a debutante, a disadvantage that we are willing to give her the benefit of, and believe that, with further opportunity, she may prove a sensible addition to the Olympic company.

The real success of the week is Maggie Mitchell as "Fanchon," at Niblo's, and were she supported by anything less than a company of confirmed sticks, we should record the affair as a complete success. Certainly as far as crowded houses go it has been, for through the entire week the passages, lobbies, and every available standing inch has been occupied to its fullest capacity. Miss Mitchell in much that she does is nature itself, and since her last appearance in New York has made marked and wonderful improvement. She is still, however, very unequal, and when—as she does occasionally—breaking into the harsh, Yankeeish drawl, especially unpleasant. In the play there is nothing save what she makes of it, and with a few weeks before a New York audience she will, without doubt, so tone herself that she may properly take rank by herself, as an exponent, not of any school, but as an original.

This week is announced as the last of "Solon Shingle," at the Broadway, and those who have not seen Mr. Owens in this the most artistic acting the New York stage has seen, and we can hardly believe that there is such person in the city, should not lose a chance that they may regret in the future. We believe that John Owens's "Solon Shingle" will remain one of the legends—classical if you please—of the stage for ever.

Barnum is given up to dogs, charming dogs, who do everything but speak, and we are not sure but they do that also when they get off by themselves.

The Academy is closed until the 14th, when we are promised "Don Sebastiano" and "Fra Diavolo," the last as rewritten by the composer.

Of all the funny things offered to New York the funniest is that of Artemus Ward. The man who could go to Dodworth's rooms, and sit out an hour under the teachings of Artemus without getting his risibilities out of order, must have had these organs amputated in his early youth and carefully eradicated all the roots. There was something in the air of Dodworth's Hall that we did not like, something that spoke of small audiences and empty benches, of a cavernous void, and gaping, yawning people; but under the influence of Artemus light has fallen upon dark places, and early in the evening eager masses rush to occupy once empty places; smiles, horse-laughs, and tears from over-laughs have taken the place of yawns and gapes, and serene above all the placid face of the showman looks down upon the crowd, and his right hand waving the baton, trots out the pictures that unfold the hairbreath escapes by flood and field, by savages and seduction, of the learned lecturer on his route to and from the stronghold of Mormondom. There is no better way of spending an evening in New York now than with Artemus, provided you can get in.

What shall we say of Heller? So much has been said of this wonderful man—is he a man?—that we feel as though we were following a beaten track no matter what we say. We have a little theory of our own about Heller. We believe him to be only —— in disguise, looking around New York and seeking whom he may ——. The wisdom that he shows in not running after his prey is good. He rather chooses to weave his web at a prominent spot in Broadway, and lure victims into it by attractions they cannot withstand. What we cannot understand we persist in believing diabolical, even though the perpetrator chooses to tell us that it is only a clever trick. Now we cannot understand this scarlet spirit business; we cannot understand the goblin drum; we cannot understand a lot of other things that Heller does, and though Heller tells us that they are only clever tricks, we persist in sticking to our theory unless he immediately calls on us and tells how they are done, that we may explain them to the public.

NEW BOOKS.

It is but a little while since Nathaniel Hawthorne was laid in his grave, at Concord, Mass. With him perished all that was mortal of the most original literary genius that our country has yet produced. A strong and stately intellect, a tender heart, a character of childlike simplicity, a brilliant imagination, a faculty for profound analysis of emotion and motive, a quaint fancy, and a complete mastery of the art of English prose writing, were combined in him and are illustrated in his works. One of the most characteristic, instructive and charming of these is his collection of "Twice Told Tales." Each of them is, as it were, the condensed excellence of a 400 page novel. Each is pictorial and full of wise significance. But we need not, at this late day, enlarge upon the merits of a book once so obscure, now so famous. Enough to call the reader's attention to the fact that Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, of Boston, have recently published it, in two volumes, in that handsome blue and gold style of which they were the inventors several years ago. In this appropriate dress it deserves a wide circulation.

Miss M. E. Braddon's latest story, "The Doctor's Wife," has been republished, from the English edition, in neat pamphlet form, by Messrs. Dick & Fitzgerald, of this city. It is, like its predecessors from the same pen, fraught with striking incidents, skilfully woven into an interesting plot, and is written with more than Miss Braddon's customary precision of style.

The Nov'br number of the Atlantic Monthly, published by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, of Boston, contains several articles of special merit, and is in general an interesting and creditable specimen of magazine literature. Its most valuable article is "The Vengeance of Dominic de Gourgues," by Francis Parkman, which is particularly picturesque in its treatment of a romantic incident in French history. Equally animated and more instinct with the practical spirit of the passing hour is F. H. Ludlow's sketch of travel, entitled "Through Tickets to San Francisco." A more sober, but not less agreeable, paper is that which incorporates specimens of "Charles Lamb's Uncollected Writings." Mr. George W. Greene contributes an instructive paper on "The Finances of the Revolution." Politics, Slavery and the War are duly represented. The poetry in this number is of merely ordinary merit, the best specimen of verse being a timely and graceful address to the poet Bryant, on the attainment of his 70th birthday, by H. T. Tuckerman.

The subscription price of the Atlantic has, we observe, been raised to $4 per annum. This is rendered necessary by the increase in the cost of printing materials and of carrying on the publishing business. But the price is not too high for a good magazine.

Messrs. Ticknor & Fields also announce a magazine for juvenile readers, to be published monthly, under the title of Our Young Folks.

F. Leypoldt, publisher, of Philadelphia, has issued the following interesting works:

"Mendelssohn's Letters." These have been translated from the German by Lady Wallace, who has performed her task with much ability. Madame Julie de Marguerittes has supplied a pleasant biographical notice.

"Life of Chopin," by F. Liszt. This is translated by Mrs. Cook, and is a charming work.

"Musical Sketches," by Elise Polko, translated by Fanny Fuller. The Publisher's Circular says: "No lover or student of music can fail to enjoy these graceful memorials of its triumphs and marvels, and these aspirations of its mighty teachers."

FINE ARTS.

An accurate and powerful bust of the late Archbishop Hughes has been cut by Mr. Richard H. Park, a talented New York sculptor. It preserves, with singular felicity, the expression of mingled dignity and sweetness for which the countenance of the venerable prelate was remarkable. Two photographs, representing the work, in front view and in profile, have been made by Mr. M. Stadtfield, of this city, and published by Mr. M. Knoedler. The bust itself is on exhibition at Goupil's gallery.

Still another memorial to the late Archbishop is due to the action of the Board of Aldermen of this city last January, empowering Mr. B. F. Brady, a local artist, to execute a work of art as a testimonial to the memory of the venerable priest. Mr. Brady has finished his work, which is an elaborate and very handsome piece of chirography, designed for the Catholic archiepiscopal residence in this city, now occupied by Abp. McCloskey. Photographs of this memorial are already in circulation. A description of it is here condensed from one of the daily papers: "The work consists of an elaborate frame, manufactured from the finest black walnut, carved in bold relief, and enclosing seven tablets, the centre one of which contains a beautiful crayon drawing of the deceased archbishop, dressed in full canonicals, with the crozier in one hand and the mitre in the other. The frame is 11 feet high and 8 feet wide, in the form of three arches, each of which is surmounted by a cross. The bottom of the frame, which is intended to be hung against the wall, is ornamented by a massive and elaborately carved figure of an angel holding a shield, bearing an escutcheon, upon which is inscribed the coat of arms of the deceased. In side tablets the resolutions of the Board of Aldermen are engrossed, the whole presenting the appearance of the finest engraving. In the various panels are grouped 13 pictures, representing the emblems of the Church. The frame is in keeping with the design of the pictures. At the top of the centre arch, just under the cross, is a medallion head, in bold relief, of the deceased prelate, surrounded by an artistic group of archiepiscopal crosses and other religious emblems, harmoniously blended, producing a very pleasing effect."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—We cheerfully call attention to the following announcement: "We are glad to see that our brave soldiers in the field before Petersburg and Richmond are to be remembered on the approaching Thanksgiving. In addition to Mr. Blunt's suggestion that they be supplied with 50,000 turkeys, a movement has been inaugurated to send them 1,000 barrels of choice apples. The names connected with this generous scheme are such as will insure its success, and are a guarantee to any who may wish to aid in it that their money will be faithfully applied. Contributions may be sent to Storrs Bros., No. 121 Chambers street; Garbutt, Black & Hendricks, Nos. 168 and 170 Chambers street; Lathrop, Luddington & Co., Nos. 23 and 25 Park place, and Spencer & Porter, No. 106 Front street.

—— A Boston paper says there are now 166 suits for divorce upon the dockets of the Supreme Court in that city. Some of these are old cases, and probably never will be tried. Others have been recently entered. The causes alleged for a judicial separation are cruelty, desertion, criminality, etc. In a majority of cases the wife seeks a divorce from the husband. There is also a large number of petitions of divorced persons for leave to marry again.

—— About twice as much cotton was received at New York during the first two months of this year as was received during the corresponding period, either in 1863 or 1862. In 1862 the receipts were 89,562 bales; in 1863, 86,930; in 1864, 169,473. During the same period there were exported from New York in 1862, 18,018 bales; in 1863, 12,636 bales; in 1864, 25,010 bales.

—— A treaty has been concluded with the Indian tribes of Southern and Middle Oregon, by which 25 square miles of land are ceded to the United States—so says an exchange paper. We thought that the whole of Oregon was already the property of the United States.

—— Mrs. Lizzie Conwell Wilson died recently at Cambridge, Mass. She had acquired reputation as a poet, under her maiden name, Lizzie Conwell Smith.

—— Our venerable contemporary, the Hartford Courant, completed its 100th year on the 20th of Oct.

—— The remains of the late Rev. Starr King, who died at San Francisco, were removed on the 22d of September, and deposited in a new resting-place prepared for them in the burying-ground adjoining his own church. A splendid monument of Columbia marble is there erected to his memory.

—— William Cullen Bryant, one of the most eminent of American poets, attained his 70th year on the 3rd inst. Mr. Bryant is a native of Western Massachusetts.

—— Further sketches of the raid on St. Albans are deferred in consequence of an excess of fresh themes for illustration.

—— A Boston paper makes mention of a wonderful blind musician. He plays on various musical instruments with remarkable skill; his voice is of extraordinary compass, rising to the highest tenor notes, and sinking to lower base notes than any other singer has yet been able to reach. He can play the cornet with one hand, and with the other accompany himself on the piano. He is a gentleman of good general culture, having graduated from the Ohio Institute for the Blind.

—— The New Orleans Picayune devotes over two columns to prove that the climate of that city is not unhealthy, as often alleged, but is, on the contrary, favorable to vigorous old age, and a prolongation of the mental, physical and moral energies and capacities of man.

—— Messrs. Amasa J. Parker, W. F. Allen and William Kelley, the Commissioners appointed by Governor Seymour, to visit Washington and investigate the charges of fraud against the State agents for receiving the soldiers' votes, have made their report. They had interviews with the Secretary of War, and obtained from him permission to visit in prison Col. North and Messrs. Cohen and Jones, the arrested persons, who were subjected to improper treatment and great deprivation. They say that they could obtain no copies of the charges against the accused, and have found no evidence that frauds were committed by them. They state also, that soldiers desirous of voting the Democratic ticket meet with great difficulties in their efforts to do so. The Commissioners requested of the Secretary of War that either Col. North and Messrs. Cohen and Jones should be given up for trial to the State authorities, or that the proceedings in their cases should be postponed till after the Presidential election, and they be released on parole, neither of which being complied with, a communication was addressed to President Lincoln by Messrs. Parker, Allen and Kelly, stating the entire case, and their labors being completed, they left Washington. It will be seen that one of the desires of the Commission—the postponement of the trial till after the Presidential election—has been complied with by the adjournment of the court to the 14th inst.

—— Mr. Belmont has offered to wager $10,000 that if Lincoln is elected the war will last his term, and that the Union will be broken up. He also wagers the same sum, that if McClellan is elected the Union will be restored before his term expires, and that there will be peace on that basis.

FOR VICTORY!

BY MYRON FOX.

THE darkness flies, the flush of morn
Proclaims that day is being born—

The darkness of our nation's night,
When Wrong threw gauntlet to the Right,

And there was gloom, and pain, and jar,
And all the hideous crash of war:

The golden day, the day of good,
When o'er the land sweet peace shall brood,

And the united nation's path
Shall lead from out the vale of wrath.

Almighty God, our Sovereign Lord,
To Thee, at whose commanding word

Chaotic night gave radiant birth
To suns, and moons, and stars, and earth;

Who giveth nations life or death,
And good or evil, with their breath,

To Thee, Jehovah, Lord, to Thee,
We give all thanks for victory!

From the death-field of smoke and flame
We come with anthems to Thy name.

A nation saved bows at Thy throne,
And gives the praise to Thee alone!

To Thee we pray: God save the right;
O Father, nerve us for the fight—

The work that yet remains to do,
In combat for the good and true.

And when bright peace shall come again,
We'll praise Thee in more gladsome strain.

To Thee, Jehovah, Lord, to Thee,
All praise we'll give for victory.

CHECKERED LIFE.

SCENE I.

A FREESTONE mansion in Fifth avenue, New York. Time, evening. Carriages thunder up to the door, and numerous beshawled and cloaked ladies and gentlemen enter the domicile. It is the first reception of Maggie Doremus, the only child of one of the noblest of the merchant princes of the proud city. Happy they who are entitled to entrance! More happy they who receive the smile of friendship from the beautiful girl! Here was that charming simplicity that denoted that the freshness of childhood was not yet gone, but was ennobled by a refined taste and a pure heart.

The party was a brilliant success. There were two or three witty conversationalists in the parlors, who kept a crowd perpetually amused by their keen repartees. A retired nook was found, where a number of "good people" withdrew from frivolity to discuss benevolence and scandal. And the great drawing-room was gorgeous with splendid dresses, gay with song and dance. Such a party! Wealth and wit, youth and beauty, learning and taste! Everybody saw, and heard, and partook of just what was most desired, and was most exquisite, and then, before being cloyed with anything, were whisked off to something else equally agreeable, so that ennui and boredom for once were forgotten.

In the midst of the gay scene Mr. Doremus approached his daughter.

"Maggie," said he, "Mr. Suydam is in the parlor, and I wish you to become acquainted with him. I have invited him to spend his vacation at our house."

"Why, pa," said Maggie, "I thought his opinions were so strict that he would not attend a party like this."

"Well, I believe he had no choice. He wrote to me that he should be in town to-night, and I sent Patrick down to the ferry with the carriage to meet him, and bring him directly here. It did not occur to me but that he would have a suitable dress, and it is now too late to remedy the difficulty."

"I will go with you now, pa," said Maggie.

"Who is this Suydam that Mr. Doremus spoke of?" asked one lady of another.

"Oh, I understand he is a theological student at Brunswick, whom Mr. Doremus has educated. His father used to be a merchant here in auld lang syne, and was unfortunate. You must recollect him. The Suydams are all stout people this son, who, it is said, will make a first chop dominie."

"Rather dangerous to bring him here where Maggie is—a girl with no mother to advise her. It would be a pity to have all this money go to a dominie."

"Not in the least risk; Maggie is unusually sensible! Besides, this Suydam is nobody yet. But what do you think? Is there any chance for that frightful Mrs. Wilcox to catch Doremus?"

Meantime Mr. and Miss Doremus entered the parlor. In one of the shadiest corners—if that could be shady which was all light and splendor—sat the stalwart Suydam. His velvet coat he occupied "seemed stuck full of pins." Eyes of the great, the polished, the witty, the learned, the beautiful fell on him with fierce glances of ridicule, pity, of scorn, as the risible, the sympathetic or the proud prevailed in the temperament of their possessors. Looked once and then were suddenly withdrawn, involuntarily asking, "What the deil does he here?"

Poor, unmirthful, countrified student! Little didst thou know what thou wast to encounter when gratitude compelled thee to accept the invitation of the kindest of thy wider kindness and to requests commands. Mr. Doremus had met him at the door of the house, had conducted him to his room, had waited for him till he was prepared to descend to the parlor, and then, the minister suddenly became conscious that his personal pride, which had prevented him from procuring suitable professional attire while he was yet deposited, had placed him in a most embarrassing position toward both his benefactor and his guests. Coloring to the forehead, he began a stammering apology, which his host cut short by plying numerous questions about his professors, until poor Suydam found himself in a corner of the crowded parlor, longing for the earth to open and swallow him up.

At most more and Mr. Doremus returns, and leaning upon his arm is a vision of more than earthly beauty. Clad all in white, with no ornament except a necklace of costly pearls, her glossy brown hair folded in no stinted Grecian coiffure and supported by a golden arrow, brilliant hazel eyes fairly illuminating an open, intelligent, handsome face, Maggie Doremus had a countenance that, once seen, could never be forgotten.

Straight up to the trembling criminal on his own eminence of fame did the daughter venture, and without waiting a word from her father, as if she knew that the poor boy would break down under a formal introduction, put out a hand out to him as he rose, trembling, and spoke — "Angels and ministers of grace!" she spoke—and in the dialect of mortals!

"Good evening, Mr. Suydam; we are glad to see you in New York. You must find it quite a relief to have vacation over, and be your own master for a while," and so on, with a series of commonplace remarks, until self-possession had returned to the student. She then observed to her father, who had remained at her side, much gratified at her tact:

"I will introduce Mr. Suydam to Professor G—— and Doctor M——, whom I see in conversation with Mr. L. I have hardly exchanged a word with them to-night."

So without ceremony she placed her glove on Mr. Suydam's old coat sleeve—happy old coat, from thenceforth thou wast glorified!—and boldly led the way into a little knot of magnificos.

"Professor G——, great is the honor your presence confers upon your grateful pupil. Let me introduce to you one of our republic of letters, Mr. Suydam. Dr. M——, that article of yours in the Lancet, upon Kleptomania, was horribly fascinating. And our cousin, the editor, discusses! Have you read the discussion, Mr. Suydam, upon Moral Insanity? No! Then I will lend you my numbers. Dr. Van Suydam. Also Mr. L——, famous as a punster. Beware of him!"

"I pun!" cried Mr. L——. "Pun-ica fides! 'Frailty, thy name is woman!'"

"Don't give him a chance!" interrupted Dr. M——. "We have only just reduced him to silence. I have refused him by my watch; he requires just six seconds in order to charge his battery before perpetrating an atrocity."

"Curious," said Mr. L——, "how these logomachs disparage word-wit. They maintain that word-war is something glorious, and confuse sense with sound by great mouthing epithets. But the sparkling of dazzling verbosity, like the phosphorescent gleams of tropical seas parted by dolphin thought, the clatter of metal folios in cavernous mines, struck by the hammer——"

"Stitch!" cried Dr. M——. "I surrender! Only don't dilute upon the poetry of what the lexicographer calls a low species of wit."

"Word-bashing wit low!" said Mr. L——.

"Mr. Suydam, doesn't Horace express somewhere exactly the opposite sentiment?"

"I only recollect one passage," said Mr. Suydam, "which seems to inculcate any such idea; the celebrated ode, Quos ille vis Lyricis,' which might, perhaps, be rendered:

'But write me great in punster lore,
My head sublime the stars shall bore.'

the reference, doubtless, being to sublunary stars."

"Mr. Suydam," said Dr. M——, "are you any relation to the Suydam, once famous in Yorktown, of Suydam & Rapelje?"

"His son, sir," said the youth, now with trembling lip.

"My dear boy!" cried the doctor. "Why, your father and myself were intimate friends! Ah, boy! I see his expression in your countenance. Professor, how these fathers live in the children! I am sometimes almost frightened when I look in the mirror, thinking for a moment that I see my father there! You recollect Mr. Suydam?"

"Very well, and ever since this young gentleman has been here I have been endeavoring to recover the locality and recollection having me. It is all vividly renewed now. For many years Mr. Suydam had a box near mine at the Post Office, and it so occurred that in those days my wife was accustomed to go ourselves for our letters at the same hour. Our punctuality became to each other a proverb."

One remark led to another. In the full flow of conversation Miss Doremus gliding away, produced no break in the tide; and all "were merry as a marriage bell."

SCENE II.

THIS scene commences in the same location as the former, but, alas! the rod flag is hung out the doorway. The firm of Doremus & Co. is no more. Numerous low commissions, executed with the honest agents, and at last a commercial crisis had brought the company to the verge of ruin, when the sudden death of Mr. Doremus inflicted the final blow. Maggie gave up all, even her personal effects, and had the satisfaction of saving her father's honor; but, then, nothing remained but to seek some employment that might afford subsistence.

Let us do her friends justice. A gentleman, who had sought her hand in the days of prosperity, now renewed his proffer, and was again kindly but firmly refused. More than one invitation was addressed to her to reside with them, even in the families of old friends, all of which were respectfully but decidedly declined. What will she do?

But suddenly a new actor appeared. James Suydam, the eldest child, the favorite orator of the mean order. He now sought the daughter of his benefactor, avowed his attachment, and entreated her to become his wife. Maggie, with a sense of gratitude which his host out-shyn by plying numerous questions about his professors, until poor Suydam found himself in a corner of the crowded parlor, longing for the earth to open and swallow him up.

"Mr. Suydam, doesn't Horace express somewhere exactly the opposite sentiment?"

"I only recollect one passage," said Mr. Suydam,

"I will be plain with you, Mrs. Suydam, for you can hear it. Your son's disease is hopeless in this climate. I do not know that any removal can save him; but it is certain that he will die here. There is a chance, if you could take him by the overland route to California, that the clear, piercing air of the plains, followed by the dry atmosphere of that remarkable country, may restore him to health. Think over my words."

"There is no need to think," replied Maggie. "To save my son's life, I would go to the ends of the earth."

So she at once announced that as soon as she could complete her arrangements, they would commence their journey for the Golden State. To western children the elder mother, yet Maggie herself was astonished at the effect of her words. Jamie rallied as if by enchantment, and while a stern flush would at times darken, began to tell his sister of the horses and oxen, of the great herds of buffaloes and the howling wolves that would wander at night around the camp fires, and afraid to come near. "Oh, mother!" cried he, "when we reach California, there we shall see what you have told us so much about, the great, great sea. Then we'll go to the ships with their white sails, and the little boats that toss on the great waves, just as when you used to go to Rockaway."

All was speedily arranged. Experienced guides were called in to decide what outfit was needful for the journey. The horse was dispensed with; two careful men were hired to drive the teams, and on the first day of May, with two commodious wagons, each drawn by six mules of sturdy, quick-stepping sisters, the party were ferried across the Missouri at Council Bluffs.

One of these wagons contained the family, and was their kitchen and bedroom. The other contained their stores.

A long train of emigrants, with more than a hundred wagons, was in company, and a formal agreement was made to keep together until they should reach the Snowy Mountains. At the first night encampment on the banks of the Missouri, a meeting of the emigrants was called, a captain elected, and the route for several days in advance was agreed upon.

After Maggie had partaken of her supper, and her hired men had gone away to some other family, as she was anxious to be with her children, an elderly man in the roughest attire of a trapper—buckskin hunting shirt and pants stained by many months exposure, dilapidated fur cap, long gray hair and all but a complete wild hunter, approached her, slowly and carefully scrutinizing herself, the children, the wagons. Having apparently satisfied his curiosity, he addressed her.

"Evening, marm!"

"Good evening, sir," replied Maggie, and then partly from a desire to be civil, and partly perhaps from the habit acquired by her husband's profession, she added, "Will you take a seat, sir?"

"Er'yer please," said the trapper, evidently delighted with the attention.

"I hain't seen a woman, marm, and have born tell that yer war takin that peeked-lookin boy of yourn to California for his health. Right place, then a long way off. Ye can't stand it here, I'm goin to say. This here train will soon break up I reckon. I've seed a heap of trains, but I never seed one that could get to Sweetwater without a breakin up. I hain't hired men of yourn will he of no count on the plains. They're hound to quit the first time they get hurtful."

"Why, what should I do?" said Maggie. "I never yoked a steer in my life, or drove one."

"Jest what I thought," chuckled the trapper. "Howsomever, marm, I reckon I kin jest see how the men do it, and yer'le soon learn. But that warn't what I war goin to say. I seed yer had to go to Fisher's spring for water, and that won't do. Suppose t'other wagon war stampeded by varmints, or washed away in the branch, what yer got here to eat?"

"Nothing," replied Maggie.

"I'll help yer rectifier that when we are done this here council. Suppose one of these cussed Injuns creeps up to yer wagon, I don't see any rifle or six shooter at hand."

"I have not got any," said Maggie.

"Never got any shootin irons in yer life?"

"I never fired off a gun."

"I have!" cried Jamie, "and I can load a rifle too!"

"That's the critter!" said the trapper. "Now I'm not goin to have yer start across the plains without a rifle and six shooter. I've got some campaigners here, and we'll jest pass the hat around for yer."

"No! no!" said Maggie, "I can pay for a gun myself—that is, I think I can. How much will it cost?"

"I'm powerful sorry yer won't let me git the irons as I wanted to. Howsomever, there is a feller over here got straight as pokrer, and I can get his right cheap."

The trapper then deliberately rose and went into the crowd, from whence he presently returned with a handsome double-barrel shot gun and a revolver. The gun was fortunately within Maggie's means, and she cheerfully paid the amount to the trapper. The latter then proceeded to explain the use of the weapons, and nearly gave Jamie a warshoop of pleasure when he saw how quickly his lessons were learned.

"Now, marm," said the trapper, "here come yer rons. We'll jest put a little hard tack, some bacon and sarce in yer own wagon, and then if Yother gives yer the slip, it's all right."

The hired men at first refused to make any change, and the trapper grew dark and silent; but the captain of the train happening to come up, the matter was explained to him by the trapper, and the transfer to be immediately made.

When all had been done the trapper spoke to the two men.

"Look here, fellers! Yer've got some d—— trick in yer mind. I'll be on the plains afore summer's over, if yer play any dirty trick on this here woman, or the pickaninnies, I'll lift your hair like Injuns and wear it. Look here!" And opening the bosom of his hunting-shirt, he displayed a number of bloody scalplocks. Then haughtily, and without a glance at the company, he stalked away and Maggie saw him no more.

The opinion of the trapper respecting the train proved correct. Day by day it was lessened by the withdrawal of some of the company. Near the head waters of the Platte it was completely disbanded; and the morning after, the two hired men employed by Maggie hitherto yoked her three best teams of oxen to her heavy wagon and drove away, leaving her encamped where they had stood for the night. So much had been her fear of them for some time, that she had never had down her harnessing with her firearms ready in her reach, and by daily practice had made herself an adept at their use. When the men deserted her, she felt rather relieved than otherwise.

SCENE III.

ONE thousand four hundred miles west of Council Bluffs lies the Humboldt Desert. Basaltic or volcanic rock, presenting many forms of desolation, border the desert on the south. Some distance northward lies that desolate region through which flows the Humboldt River. Eastward and westward extends a great plain of shineline soil, which refuses to support any vegetation, except an occasional patch of sage brush, which no domestic animal will eat. Over this desolation cattle travellers almost entirely to avoid this horrible region, and where the road leads over any portion which is for two days or more without water to obviate its sufferings. The surface of the earth in this season is covered with an impalpable dust like ashes. Every breeze is laden with this dust, and remains suspended in the air long after the passenger has gone by. Five or six years ago this desert was the terror of this danger for death in breadth, and where the main emigrant trail could be tracked by the bones of animals, and even human beings, whose strength had failed on the route, and who had perished.

One hot day in the early part of August, 1858, a single wagon was driven by two men over the crossing this frightful region. The company consisted of a sunburnt woman, attired in a faded calico dress, with shoes in which the worse for wear, and an old sidesaddle sunbonnet on her head. A thin-faced boy, some seven years of age, was driving the team. In the front part of the wagon, seemed to be lying in a heap, was a little girl, evidently with the flush of fever, even through the coating of dust which covered her face, and which she seemed to be trying to brush away with a little veil of an old palmleaf fan that had been brought from Oriental deserts, as if with the intent to perish in a wilderness.

Everything about the company proved that they were nigh exhaustion. The train, emaciated cattle, which could move on but three abreast, whose tongues seemed fairly parched by the heat. The timbers of the wagon had shrunk out of place in the intense dryness of the air, and were kept lonely kept on the wheels by being bound with rawhides. The woman would occasionally relieve the boy at the helm, but her voice was always raised in cheering words of encouragement. Suddenly the cattle stopped, and one of them lay down.

"Let us just have one more drink of water in the bucket for Dewlap," said the woman. "Perhaps when he tastes it, he will start again."

The ox drank the water, and looked eagerly for more.

"You cannot have it, old fellow," said the woman. "It is for your betters; just see how the—Jim, mother," said the boy, "if he dies, we shall perish too."

The woman made no reply, but began to chase the lying ox with a mournful cry and hands.

"Ma! ma!" cried the little girl, "a man on horseback is coming."

From the westward a man was now seen riding at a gallop towards them. He soon reached the wagon.

"Good!" said he, "your critter gin out. That's bad, for there are Injuns comin. If you could git over the divide, south yonder, you would see a long tree. You will find there a spring with water and grass. But yonder come the varmints. I can't help you. All I can do is to save my own scalp."

And the stranger spurn into his horse and rode off full speed.

And now, following on his trail, came into view a band of mounted savages, with feathers of plumes and war paint. Their fierce countenances, uncouth and merciless, were stained with vermilion, over which was settled a coat of dust, except where wash had been made by perspiration, which also covered their hard-ridden horses. With whoops they surrounded the wagon, and poured about its team. Then one of the band—apparently the leader—said some words in his jargon, and then reaching out his lance, touched the hair and head of the little girl. Blood followed the touch, and a chorus of wild hooting laughter broke from the band.

With a fierce gesture the squaw sprang to the wagon, drew the gun from beneath the seat, and at the same instant Jamie seized the revolver. "Back! back!" said she fiercely to the boy; but she waved the muzzle towards the Indians they reined back their horses, and then held a conversation.

One of the savages now dismounted, laid down his weapons, and holding out his hand, walked up towards the family. But as Margaret looked in his eye, the gleam was ferocious and cruel.

"Back or you die!" said she, and the fellow slunk away intimidated by her manner.

The Indians consulted for a moment, and then riding back about a hundred yards, alighted from their horses and sat down in a circle. One of them presently arose and began a speech. He pointed to the sun, and slowly allowed his hand to follow its course to where it would set. He acted as if groping about in darkness, and then going down upon his hands and feet, he imitated the long howl of a wolf. Presently he sprang to his feet with a wild cry, and made the rapid motion of sweeping his hand about his head three times, and then with a triumphant laugh held up three fingers. Margaret comprehended the gestures. "He is urging them," thought she, "to wait till night before attacking us, and then that they should creep up and scalp us."

Another warrior now arose. For some time he spoke in a low tone without gestures, then he became animated. He represented three positions, and horses galloping to each. Then stretching out his arms, he gave a shout and brought his hands together and folded them on his bosom. Then, like the former brave, he held up three fingers with a long laugh. Continuing his gesticulations, he pointed to the sun and made a swift motion towards the west, then he rapidly turned towards the south and the north, imitated the motion of a horse, shook his head, uttered a low wail and sat down. Immediately grunts of satisfaction came from the whole band.

"Jamie," said Margaret, "I think that man is urging the Indians to attack us immediately, lest they should be interrupted. Do you feel afraid?"

"Not the least, mother," they are cowards! I think we shall whip them; but at any rate I will kill that fellow that struck Mary."

The Indians now promptly mounted their horses and divided themselves into three bands on different sides of the wagon. They shook their lances, unloosed their bows, and with whoops made their horses caracole about. At a signal cry they formed into lines and gathered up their bridle reins. When suddenly from far broke upon the ear the report of a cannon. Then a loud whistle followed, increasing to a fearful scream. Then a smoking mass fell to the ground scarce fifty yards from the wagon, throwing up the sand as it buried itself in the ground. Then followed a thundering report, while a cloud of smoke and dust filled all the air.

"Dragoons! dragoons!" cried the savages, and without an instant's pause, setting spurs to their horses, darted off at full speed in the direction from whence they first appeared. An instant more and another shell went whistling and shrieking after them in their flight. And now from the eastward came riding up a company of cavalry, their sabres gleaming in the hot sunshine, and their scabbards and accoutrements clanking in their headlong speed. Behind them came hurrying up the gun from which had come the messengers of deliverance, and which once more limbered up, was now whirled along by six powerful horses under the lash of the impatient drivers. The whole force went sweeping by the emigrant wagon without pause, and soon was lost to sight.

"Mother!" said the lad, "the man said that Lone Tree Spring was over that divide. Let us try to reach it."

But vain was the attempt to start the oxen, both of whom were lying down. The mother fell upon her knees.

"Oh, God! suffer not my little ones to perish thus."

Then arising she endeavored again to start the oxen. But now a gentle breeze from the southward arose and fanned the weary group. Both the oxen instantly raised their muzzles towards it; and then springing up of their own accord, began to walk rapidly towards the divide. The wonderful scent for water which all thirsty cattle have is well-known to travellers in the desert. The breeze brought the well-known odor to the discouraged beasts of the emigrants, and at once inspired them with new life. The wagon was speedily tracked up the sandy elevation, from whence was plainly discerned, a mile or two away, a single tree; while for a few yards about it, the desert was greener than elsewhere. The oxen now seemed frantic with eagerness. They utterly refused guidance. They paused at no impediment. They rushed on at full speed over the now broken ground, threatening at every moment to dash the wagon to fragments. On, on, they rushed until they reached the channel which some kind hand had scooped for the rivulet; and then plunging their mouths into the clear golden water, they drank until they seemed ready to burst from repletion.

The oxen were presently unyoked, and fell greedily upon the rich herbage. Then Margaret was startled to find how much her little daughter was exhausted by the heat and the exciting scenes of the day. She even refused to more than taste of the cool fresh water, so rare on the route; and though before she had suffered much from thirst. The slight effort needful to wash off the oppressive dust seemed to leave her languid and faint.

"Come, ma!" said she, presently, "take me in your arms, and tell me about the great beautiful sea."

Margaret gathered her close to her heart, while a dark, deep fear fell upon her.

"Ma," said the little one, "do you love Mary? I was not afraid of the Indian. I knew he could not hurt me."

Slowly the hours went by. The sun descended behind the distant mountains, and darkness came creeping over the earth, and curtained in the little family. Jamie had found a limb or two broken from the tree, which he had cut into small pieces, and brought to the wagon, together with some armfulls of dried grass. He had, however, delayed a little to kindle the fire, when suddenly the oxen came running to the wagon, a dog that had followed them for a thousand miles, partaking of their fare, uttered a short bark, followed by a long melancholy howl. As it died away, twenty, then a hundred voices took up the same plaintive wail, and then followed a chorus of yelping, snapping, howling cries, enough to chill the blood with terror.

"Jamie, my dear, the fire! the fire!"

"All right, mother," and the clear flame blazed up, flashing splendor upon a score of gaunt forms with white teeth and glaring eyes which shrunk back from the light.

The cool night winds blew through the thin curtains.

"Is my little Mary cold?"

"No, ma. Ma's darling is so happy."

"Did you not feel afraid when you heard the howling wolves?"

"I have not heard them to-night. Oh, ma, we are almost to the sea."

"At the sea! Oh, no, my dear, we have yet far to go."

"Ma's darling has not. Oh, ma!" exclaimed she, as if rallying from her languor; "I see it now It is like the great prairie, only it shines like silver. I see, oh! so many people there. Oh, ma! There is pa!"

She raised her head from her mother's bosom; she stretched upwards her little arms; then the head fell back as heavy as lead, and the arms sank down powerless.

And now the moon arose vast and red from the eastern desert. Calmly it shone down upon the solemn scene, the arid mountains, the sandy waste, the lonely tree, the little rivulet, the poor emigrants. It also shone far off on the great cities, cultivated fields, and all the appliances of wealth. But upon nothing over the wide earth did it shed a sweeter lustre than upon the countenance and form of the little girl that lay dead in her mother's arms in the emigrant wagon.

All night long Margaret sat motionless, holding close to her heart the inanimate form. With the first light of morning she said to Jamie:

"Come, my son! help me to prepare a place to lay down our little Mary to sleep."

They selected a spot near a ledge of rocks that broke up through the sod. They scooped out the sand sufficiently to make a shallow grave. They wrapped the little form in the best garments they had remaining, and enclosed all in a blanket, and then softly laid down the precious dust in the humble grave. Mother and son then knelt down, and with tears and broken words mingled with sobs uttered the prayers and promises of Christian hope. They filled the grave, piling up into form the mound above. Then going to the ledge, they rolled down the heaviest rocks they could move, and piled them around and above the sacred spot, so that no wild beast could disturb it. All day was occupied with these pious labors. Night once more gathered over the scene, and mother and son, comforted by their faith in God, safely slept beneath the bright moonlight, protected by the angel guards that kept watch and ward around the lonely grave of Mary Suydam.

SCENE IV.

This is laid in a canon or narrow valley in the mountains of San Luis, Obispo county, California. The high road from San José to Santa Barbara here follows for some distance up the course of the rivulet; then turning southward crosses the stream and ascends a precipitous hill. As soon as the rocky bed of the creek is past, another road, but less travelled than the former, is seen to turn abruptly into the forest to the right, and continue to follow up the rivulet, though now on the right bank.

To this spot, one soft, pleasant morning in the latter part of November, came Margaret Suydam and her only child. Kind hands had helped them across the Sierras, and thus far on their route. Upon reaching the valley of the Sacramento, the oppressive heat brought on a recurrence of unfavorable symptoms in Jamie. A distinguished physician, familiar with the climate of the country, had recommended them to go on to Santa Barbara.

"If," said he, "there is a spot on earth that will restore your boy to health, that is it."

Probably he may have supposed that they had money to carry them to the place by steamer. But it was not so. Upon endeavoring to sell her poor worn-out cattle and wagon, Margaret found that the miserable pittance offered would barely serve to support life for a few days, and was altogether too small for an expensive voyage. She had, therefore, undertaken to go the four hundred miles additional, as she had already the two thousand from Iowa. Slowly had they travelled through the long valleys of San Joaquin, San José and Salinas, through long mountain passes, and still, but with strength well-nigh exhausted, were toiling up the slight rise of road described, within hearing of the murmuring rivulet, and under the shade of madronas and bay trees.

The boy sat in front of the dust-covered wagon, as his sister had in the Humboldt desert, and also like her, pillows propped up his emaciated frame. The mother walked by the side of the scarcely moving oxen, who, whenever she turned to speak to the boy would instantly stop, and it required much effort to induce them to start again. They reached the turn of the road, crossed the rivulet, and attempted to ascend the hill. With great exertion the cattle dragged the wagon a few steps upward, then stopped, and the wagon drew them backward to the foot of the hill. Two or three times the attempt was made, but always with the same result.

"Mother," said Jamie, "it is impossible to succeed. We may as well give up making the the trial."

"Then," returned she, "it only remains to lie down and die."

"Mother," said Jamie, "God has always taken care of us, and he will not leave us now."

But the brave heart that had endured so much could bear no more. In its last descent the wagon had turned, and run partly off the road. She made no attempt to replace it, but silently disconnected the cattle, who immediately lay down upon the road. She assisted her son to alight upon the ground, placed his pillows under the shade of the dense foliage of a bay tree, and then sat down by his side, hopeless, and without strength.

The great voices of nature only were heard. The wood pigeon softly cooed from the depths of the glen. The cry of the jay from time to time broke startlingly upon the ear. The timid hare rustled the fallen leaves, as he came out from his furrow to gaze upon the unwonted sight; while the voice of the rivulet ceased not its perpetual murmur.

Gradually the scene seemed to diffuse its heavenly calm into the mother's breast, and she was enabled to feel that she could submissively await God's will.

Noon had come and past. Suddenly upon the highway, which the wagon had traversed, was heard the clattering of a horse's hoofs. The sound was first faint and far away; but every moment it grew louder, until the rider came galloping out from behind the trees that hid the road beyond the rivulet, and his horse shied violently from the scene that came in view.

"Gently! gently! Caballo! old horse!" said the unshaken rider. He was a man of perhaps thirty-five years of age; tall, stately and commanding in aspect. His countenance was mild yet firm. He was one of those men whom nature forms to decide the destinies of nations, to lead armies in the headlong charge, and who are equally fortunate in commanding the confidence and affection of women and children.

With a few coaxing words he reduced his steed, a magnificent black Spanish horse, to subjection, and then drew nigh to the travel-stained group under the bay tree.

"I perceive by the trail," said he, "that your steers were not able to draw your wagon up the hill. Has the man with you gone for help?"

"We have no man with us," said Jamie.

"You look, my young friend, as if times had gone hardly with you!" returned the stranger. "I, myself, have a little skill in medicine, although not a licensed physician. Will you let me see if I cannot prescribe for you?"

Saying this, he alighted from his horse, and came to the side of the lad lying upon his pillows. He asked a few intelligent questions that made him master of the boy's symptoms. Then turning to Margaret, he said:

"I have known worse cases restored in this remarkable climate. You have travelled, I see, from far."

"From Iowa," replied Jamie. "Dr. B., of Sacramento, advised us to go to Santa Barbara."

"Excellent advice," said the stranger, "and yet it is hardly prudent to be upon the road so late in the season. I am daily expecting the rains to commence. A month ago there was not a particle of water in this rivulet, yet how freely it flows now. The dew last night, too, was very heavy, and both indicate storms in this climate. Exposure even to one might be very injurious to you, my young friend!"

"Mother is doing all she can for me," said the boy. "She has come all the way across the plains to try to make me well. And I know that when I see the great sea I shall get well. Father died before we came from home. My little sister died in the desert, and mother and I buried her. I feel sure that we shall not be parted. We have nobody but each other and God in the world."

"And God," said the stranger, reverently lifting his hat from his head, and looking up to the sapphire sky, that seemed far away between the setting of mountains. "God will take you into his holy keeping! But why do you speak of the sea? Do you think it can cure you?"

"My son has often heard me speak of the ocean," said Margaret, "near which my parents used to live. He has never seen it, and thinks that, when we reach Santa Barbara, the sea air will restore him to health."

"Well!" said the gentleman, looking at his watch, "it is now one o'clock. The sun will set a little before five. Yes! I think by sundown if we are successful you will look upon the sea, and as you do, I hope it may cure you."

Then turning to Margaret he added:

"My mother lives about seven or eight miles from here. You had better come to our house to-night. I will ride home, procure a fresh team and return as soon as I can, to help you out of this difficulty. Of course I may be subject to a little delay, but I think I shall be able to be back in two or three hours. On this road where you are you are liable to be disturbed by bad people, so I think we had better drive a few hundred yards up this other road, which is the way to my ranch."

Jamie was then carefully helped to his seat in the wagon by the stranger. He then attached the oxen to the vehicle, and turning to Margaret:

"Now, madam!" said he, "if you will please to take a seat by your boy, I will drive the team."

"But your horse?" said she.

"Oh, I can lead him, too," he replied, smiling.

The oxen at once recognised the hand of authority. With a rapidity that they had not manifested for weeks, they promptly obeyed the commands of the driver; and turning into the road that led by the banks of the rivulet, walked along under the deep shadows of the forest. In about half a mile they came to an opening in the wood, where were a few acres of grass land, and where also was the source of the stream. Beyond the road ascended the steep mountain.

"Your cattle," said the gentleman, "could never draw your wagon over this mountain. I will now leave you for the present. In about two hours you may expect me back."

Then having loosened the oxen from the wagon, having first driven into the shade, he mounted his horse, ascended the mountain at speed, and presently was lost to sight in the turnings of the road.

"Don't you think that God sent him for our help?" said Jamie.

"I hope so!" was the reply.

"Oh, mother," he said, "that before sundown I should look upon the sea! Do you think it is so near?"

"I did not suppose it was. But, probably, this is the Coast Range, and when we cross over to the other side we may be able to discern the ocean?"

"Oh! I do so hope we shall," said Jamie, and then he began to repeat the words of Barry Cornwall's famous song:

> "The sea! the sea! the open sea!
> The blue, the fresh, the ever free!
> Without a mark, without a bound,
> It runneth the earth's wide regions round,
> It plays with the clouds, it mocks the skies,
> Or like a cradled creature lies."

Two hours passed, and the short day of autumn was palpably drawing towards its close. The great sun, wheeling towards the west, seemed already to touch the mountain top.

"Ah!" said Jamie, with a sigh, "I am afraid it will be too late for to-day."

But while the words were on his lips, from up the road came the sound of the clattering and scrambling of a descending team. A moment more and they came in sight, with a person driving; while upon horseback, at his side, rode the gentleman who had promised to relieve them. And now he has reached the emigrants.

"Do you think we shall be in time?" cried Jamie.

"Yes, I do!" said the gentleman; "and meantime here is an excellent remedy for fever. You can eat freely, they will not hurt you, and they will refresh you, madam, very much."

So saying, he took from his arm a basket covered with broad, fresh leaves. These being removed, beneath appeared immense clusters of superb purple grapes.

The fresh team, composed of four powerful Devon oxen, their deep red hair brilliant and glossy as silk, were now attached to the wagon.

"If you please," said the gentleman, "we will just chain your steers to the back of your wagon, passing the chain under the axle forward, and we shall take them up the mountain whether they like it or not. My man here is an excellent driver, and I will ride by your side to see that you are all safe."

In a moment more the arrangements were completed, and with unwonted speed Margaret and Jamie are hurried up the steep mountain road. The sun soon sank out of sight, but his light still shone on all the summits round about.

An hour elapses as they travel on; then the ascent ceases, the woods open. A moment more and they stand upon the summit of the mountain. The road turns abruptly to the left. In front is a precipitous descent a thousand feet in fall. At its foot is a mile or two of plain. But beyond it, reaching out to the almost illimitable horizon, extends the mighty Pacific Ocean. It lays like an immense bed of burnished silver, its waves from the elevation either being lost to sight or only flashing little sparkles of splendor. Above the ocean was the nearly setting sun, all surrounded with gold and purple, and marking the pathway, from the eye to where it was going down, with a dazzling line of amber light.

The wagon stopped at a signal from the gentleman, but no word was spoken. Silently all gazed upon that great magnificence of sea and sky. The sun went down behind the waves. A moment more and a great flush of ruby glory fell upon the deep, the mountains and the group upon the summit.

"Oh, mother!" cried Jamie, "the blush of God's love!"

What electric spark was there in the words to awaken memory? Who can say?

With the same thought the gentleman now alighted, and standing by the side of the wagon and the poor, dusty, haggard, sun-darkened woman within, looked at each other.

They beheld, oh! how different a scene from the present. The woman saw far back in memory, herself a child, a noble youth, companion of her childhood, going forth from New York in a stately ship for a distant land, and she, with sobs, waving him farewell.

He, the man, saw also in distant memory, a beautiful girl that bade him good-bye as he sailed away from the home of his boyhood, and to whom, while he strove to hide his tears, he said:

"When I come back you shall be my little wife."

What is the enchantment that can connect yonder memories with the present moment? The woman arose, trembling, from her seat, threw back her bonnet, and came to the side of the gentleman. Steadily he gazed upon her. His eye seemed to pierce the crust of poverty, the stains of travel, the haggard countenance; or, rather, did the countenance itself change? Was it the sunflush that gave the glossy ripple to the soft, brown hair? Whence the lustre flushing in the eye, the carnation that in soft currents flowed to the lip and the cheek?

Like lightning the scales fell from their eyes. Each uttered a name—"Philip Vennor!"—"Maggie Doremus!" and impulsively he clasped her in his great strong arms, and wept.

"They are coming. We hear the wheels grate on the gravel in the lawn. Bring lights to the verandah! Is the bathtub taken into the room prepared for the sick boy?"

The speaker was an aged woman. Her snow-white hair lay in slender folds beneath the fringe of her widow's cap. A black silk shawl covered her shoulders, relieved by a delicate white collar at the neck. Her countenance was still handsome, and her appearance noble and impressive.

"Here we are, mother!" cried a manly voice at the door. "Who do you think we have found?

> "Old friends and true friends,
> Ne'er talk to me of new friends!"

"I hope, in meeting them, you have not forgotten the sick boy you spoke to me about? Though, to be sure, you would not be thoughtless in such a case."

CHECKERED LIFE.

"No, indeed; not in this case. Why, mother, this is Maggie Doremus, who used to call you mother, come all the way from Iowa, to find health for her boy!"

"What Maggie! My daughter, my daughter! This is a delight indeed! Come to my arms, my darling, my darling! I saw in the papers that notice of your husband's death last winter. I am so glad that you thought of us and have come home here."

"No, my other mother," said Maggie, "I did not know that you lived here, but God brought us on the way."

"But where is your boy? Oh, here; Philip is bringing him in. Welcome here, my dear boy! Let me take you in my arms. We are so glad to have you at home. Now, Philip, take him to the west room; he can see the ocean there in the morning, and it will put him in mind of New York. Come, Maggie, the bathroom is all ready."

Four grateful hearts that night reposed beneath the stately roof of the Rancho de Santa Teresa.

CONCLUSION.

A FEW days since I had occasion to take the railroad from San Francisco to San José. In the car in which I happened to be was a family group that greatly impressed me; a lady of great personal beauty and unusual refinement of manner, a manly boy of four years old, a most exquisite little girl of two, and an infant in the arms of its nurse.

I whispered to a friend at my side:

"Who is that lovely woman yonder?"

"Not to know her proves yourself unknown," replied my friend.

"Very likely," said I; "but that don't answer my question."

"She is the spirit that presides over the Sanitary and Christian Commissions."

"Everybody that can be solicited for funds has heard of them; but I never heard that they had such a spirit of light."

"Well, of course, being a spirit, she acts invisibly, but not the less really."

"Whose daughter is she? Are those her brothers and sisters?"

"Don't fall in love with her—she is engaged. Those are her children."

"—— it is impossible!"

"Don't swear in the cars. You are from New York, and she is a famous Excelsior, but for all that she will resent any bad language in her hearing. Don't you know Phil Venner?"

"What, of the Holy Tharesa? Certainly I do."

"Well, that is his wife."

"But I heard he had got a wife who drove an ox team over the mountains."

"That is just what that woman did."

"You do not know who I refer to," said I. "I mean that lady on the third seat from yon corner, with the sheet of piano-music in her hand."

"That's the lady," said my friend. "An educated and accomplished lady. She plays the piano exquisitely, sings like an angel, speaks French and Spanish, has faced down the fiercest Indians in search of prey, will go through fire and water to save a friend in trouble, can shoot a rifle like a Kentucky hunter; in short, is California grafted on New York."

"San José!" said the conductor.

As I stepped out on the platform the first person I saw was Phil Venner.

"Hollo, Dick!" said he. "Is my wife aboard?"

"All right," I replied; "that is, if your wife is the handsomest lady in California."

(We were old cronies.)

"That's she," said he. "Come in; I will introduce you. I want you to come to the ranch this all."

When we re-entered the cars the lady was warmly kissing a stout boy of twelve years old.

"And how is grandma, Jamie?" said she.

"Very well, and wanting to see you and the children very much."

"So, Jamie, you got the start of me," said Phil.

The lady arose and held out her arms. Well, never mind description, except that I should have liked to have been in his place.

"Are the Commissions working right?" said Venner. "Have you succeeded in getting the photographs to suit? Of course you have not forgotten the FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED?"

"Why don't you ask about the baby?" said Maggie, slightly pouting.

"As if I did not know that you would have telegraphed to me if she had coughed twice! But, come, the carriage is ready," replied Phil.

A large, roomy travelling-barouche, four splendid bays, an Indian boy mounted on a chestnut horse, and holding by the bridle reins a fiery pinto or dappled steed for Jamie.

"Don't forget us, Dick!" cried Venner, and the carriage rolled away.

"Well," said I, aloud, "so elegant a lady deserves just such an elegant outfit. But for all that, I can see that her best quality is—that she is a real woman."

"She is an angel, sir!" fiercely said a one-armed soldier standing near me.

"My friend," replied I, "such a woman is better than any angel on earth."

EPIGRAM ON THE PRONUNCIATION OF A FASHIONABLE PREACHER.

Happy flock, led to feed by a pastor discreet,
 Where in plenty and peace they may fatten,
For them even bitters are rendered so sweet
 That e'en "Satan" is turned into "Satin."

THE people can't be jealous, for jealousy is never popular.

THE CRY OF THE HEART.

FROM the great depths of the divine despair
 And utter desolation of my soul,
Which, having searched for solace everywhere
 In vain, beholds at last the billows roll,
Destined to whelm it into endless night,
 I raise my voice, as on my couch I lie
In blackest gloom, and cry with all my might:
 "Give me some one to love, or let me die!"

Long have I wandered, e'en from childhood's years,
 Bearing the burden of a weary heart,
Which craved for one to share its smiles and tears,
 Hopes, joys and raptures, agonies and fears.
And ofttimes, when I've seen the day depart
 In golden splendors, I have fainting sank
On earth in sweet delirium, like to one
 Who has of some divine old vintage drank
So deeply, that the skies around him reeled,
And, crazed with beauty, suddenly revealed
 Unveiled, in all the blinding blaze of light,
 His soul has seen and shivered at the sight,
 So have I given a bewildered sigh,
And murmured, as my senses swam away
Beneath the intolerable weight of day,
 "Give me some heart to rest on ere I die!"

The vision and the phantasy divine
Floats into night, as die the dreams of wine,
Leaving a pitiless vulture gnawing where
A seraph couched, all jubilant and fair;
And as the day crawled, with its leaden gray,
Over the hills, where erst the sunset lay,
Like a grand vision on Earth's golden breast,
In the sweet languor of a bridal rest,
I woke to all life's dreariness, and felt
As one who slides from some delicious trance
Into a world of tortuous utterance,
In which life hangs upon one stifled cry.
And then I wandered through the loathsome hours
Till darkness grasped once more the haggard sky,
And in the anguish of my soul I sigh:
"Give me some breast to weep on ere I die!"

Oh, must I perish with this wealth of love,
This hidden mine of untold tenderness?
Take my unblossomed mortal joys above,
And to the Hereafter sacrifice the Less?
Must I lay down my woman's craving heart
And turn, untasting, from Love's cup, which seems
Held only to my lips in those fond dreams
Which are of my existence its best part?
Or must I raise to God the frenzied cry:
"Give me some heart to love me, or I die!"

Often, in thought, I bring you to my side,
And frame a happy picture: We both stand
Before the sacred altar, I the bride,
And you, the loved one, placing on my hand
The golden symbol of eternity.
Then on my lips yon stamp the bridal kiss,
While I, dissolving into tears with bliss,
Fall in your arms, and in my rapture sigh,
"This is life's crowning joy, now let me—let me die!"

Now on the earth I stand, with half-raised wing,
Waiting the coming of that glorious day,
When every mortal thing shall pass away,
And the great Future on the hilltops spring,
As Heaven's grand sunrise floods eternal space,
And Love shall stand with God then face to face;
But ere that come, day creeps on day, until
My wearied bones the sacred coffin fill.
Blest hour! when I shall draw my latest breath,
And, since I cannot dream on thy sweet breast,
Find calm and solace, silence and dear rest
In the cold arms of grim embracing Death?

NINA MARSH;

OR,

THE SECRET OF THE MANOR.

CHAPTER XXVI.—DRUNK AS A LORD.

FROM Beechwood Manor Colonel St. George drove straight to Rendlesham Court. So far his triumph had been rather a poor one, but he promised himself a full compensation for past mortifications in Lord Gillingham's discomfiture. He knew that every one at Beechwood despised him more or less, but he was going now where villainy was always respected, if it were only successful. Lord Gillingham might rave and storm, but it was certain that inwardly he would acknowledge his cousin's supremacy and venerate his superior cunning. Lord Gillingham never thought anything of a man until he had cheated or over-reached him. He had only the devil to cheat afterwards, as his lordship frankly avowed. The earl's compliments were very rare and very brutal, but somehow people liked them. It might have been because he was a peer and could squander his fifty thousand pounds a-year if he felt so inclined. His steward felt very proud on that day when his master called him into the library, and, slapping him on the shoulder, said, familiarly:

"I say, Smith, you're a clever fellow. You cheated me famously in that business of Robinson's. Who got the most by renewing that lease, you or I, eh?"

"My lord——" began Smith, humble and tremulous for the minute, but my lord interrupted him.

"Don't apologise, Smith; I like you all the better for it, and I give you full permission to cheat me again—if you can. You may keep twenty pounds of Robinson's money and put the rest to my account. Good morning, Mr. Smith, and ask the butler for a glass of wine as you go out."

But Mr. Smith did not seem to care for any wine just then. He went home moralising deeply, and be sure that in all his future dealings with the earl he took care to display as much honesty as zeal. Only, though Mr. Smith was resolved not to merit any more compliments of a like kind, from the day when his master had called him a clever fellow and touched his plebeian shoulder with his aristocratic hand, Mr. Smith's conceit became a burden to his neighbors and a source of diurnal aggravation to his wife; so that, as this lady herself had said, once when she was so exasperated that she felt as if she must burst if she didn't speak out, "It actually seemed as if my lord's slap had made a lord of plain John Smith." But then Mrs. Smith knew nothing about that little affair of the lease, you may be sure, and, therefore, was not so competent to judge of cause as she was of effect.

When Colonel St. George entered the drawing-room at Rendlesham Court he found his relative in the act of mixing his third glass of brandy punch, and he had an opportunity of noticing, if interested in such things, what a remarkably small quantity of the pure element was needed for the concoction. Lord Gillingham nodded towards a chair, ordered in another tumbler, and then sliced his lemon deliberately and dropped the pieces separately into the glass. He seemed so much absorbed in his occupation that St. George would not interrupt him. He went to the fire, which the cold spring night made very pleasant, stretched his legs out in front of the blaze, and showed every sign of being exceedingly comfortable.

Lord Gillingham watched him with an evil eye. He was in one of his darkest moods to-night—a mood when he drank hard, resolutely and deliberately, but, somehow, never got helplessly intoxicated, only more bitter and cruel every minute. These nights were a sad trial for the butler, worse by far than on those occasions when the earl drank with the intention of getting drunk, and, after sitting steadily to his purpose for an hour, rolled under the table, and was carried off, dumb and obtuse, and put to bed like a child. The man was grateful enough for Colonel St. George's arrival. A certain class of evils conduce terribly to selfishness. Barnes could almost have embraced the colonel's feet as he walked innocently into the wild beast's den, whilst the old bear showed its teeth in an evil grin that Barnes knew the meaning of well enough, if the other did not. But Barnes was mistaken here. Colonel St. George understood his master's moods as well as he did, only, instead of fearing, he rather enjoyed them. But, then, he had advantages poor Barnes had not. He could return insult for insult, sneer for sneer; whereas poor Barnes, who had a wife and family dependent on his one hundred pounds a-year and perquisites, could only be mute and bow humbly to his lordship's fiercest imprecations. So that he was truly glad to feel that Colonel St. George would get his share, and he could go and prepare the valet to receive his fag-end with resignation. He brought the tumbler ordered, lifting it off his silver tray with the greatest caution, and then glided noiselessly away and shut the door with a sigh of heartfelt relief.

Then the battle began.

"I didn't expect to see you," said his lordship, with no doubtful emphasis on his words.

"No, I dare say not," answered the other, smiling; "but you know I never advertise my visits. The idea takes me, and down I come, sure of a welcome and brandy punch."

His lordship touched the empty tumbler with a little growl that was meant for an invitation, after its kind.

"Presently, my lord, thank you," added St. George, who seemed to be in the sweetest of tempers. "Your cognac is excellent, as I know by experience, but it is too strong not to be a little heating, and I like to keep my head cool and my feet warm."

He drew his chair a little closer to the fire as he finished speaking, and his eye dwelt rather meaningly on the earl's hot, inflamed face, and then met smilingly his searching glance.

"I'll emulate your forbearance," replied his lordship, pushing the steaming liquor to the other end of the table. "I'll see if I can't preach moderation as well as you."

"It's rather late in the evening to begin," said the colonel, with provoking tranquillity. "It is very difficult to preach unless you are in practice. There is an epigram for your lordship, none the worse for being unintentional. But I feel inclined to follow your example of inconsistency, and change my mind about the punch. It is only the abuse of these things which injures us, not the use, and I believe I can trust myself to take enough without taking too much."

He came to the table, mixed himself a full glass, but not a strong one, and took it back to the fireplace with him, where he sipped it tranquilly and with evident enjoyment.

The earl was unusually patient for him. He knew that his cousin's visit had a motive, and was the effect of his telegram that moment, and he found himself wondering what was coming with a certain curiosity that was pleasant and stimulating from its very rarity. In spite of this coolness which Colonel St. George prided himself on so greatly, the earl was conscious that he meant to have it understood he was taking an important step, and was waiting to be questioned thereon. But he determined not to question him. The earl had his moments of dignity, and, besides, had just drunk enough to be obstinate and watchful; he was therefore a better match for his cool cousin than on ordinary occasions, or in his rare moments of perfect sobriety. His natural keenness was rather sharpened than deadened, and he was anxiously on the alert to parry any blow that might be aimed at him.

Colonel St. George was rather pleased to find the earl in this mood. He was sure of his victory in the end, but the sharper the contest was the better he should relish it. There was poor glory in beating a drunken man; but his lordship, with his wits about him, was a worthy foe, and knew how to die game. But he did object to his lordship's effort at dignity. It was rather awkward to open on his subject without encouragement. He would rather have had it extorted from him by degrees, and arrive at his grand triumph at his leisure; but since the earl chose to be so taciturn he must begin hostilities himself. He had not the advantage of the choice of a position. His first strokes were necessarily a little deadened by this disadvantage.

"Well, my lord, I received your telegram," he began.

"I never said you hadn't," growled the earl.

"I was rather astonished at the intelligence it contained."

"Ah! you were, were you?"

He took care not to say that his boast from being premature had now become fallacious. It was very bitter for him to have received this rejection, but St. George should not hear of it from his lips until the revenge he contemplated was so close that he could at first proclaim his discomfiture, and then immediately speak of his triumph. The best of men feel a little sore, either in their heart or their pride, when they have been refused by the woman they had expected to win; and the earl's dismissal had been made more than ever bitter to him by Nina's defiance and scorn, and the thought of his cousin's satisfaction. To do the earl justice, there was some real pain mingling with worse feelings. He had loved Nina after a manner; his love was neither endurable nor of good quality, but it was the best he had to offer. And born to a coronet, rendered dissolute and despotic by indulgence and impunity, the earl had always considered himself one of those lucky creatures who have only to ask to receive. When he experienced a rebuff under circumstances so stinging, the first thought to such a nature as his was revenge. But lest anything should mar this prospect, and put Colonel St. George beforehand with him in certain negotiations he meant to open on the morrow, he determined to keep the secret of his defeat from his cousin as long as possible. He started, therefore, apprehensively when Colonel St. George said with studied carelessness:

"I have just returned from Beechwood Manor."

"Oh, indeed!" was all the earl could say; and he said that very badly, for his cousin felt that he had made up for the first disadvantages of his position, and was sure of the effect of his next blow.

"I saw Nina, and she not only distinctly denies any engagement with you, but she also promises to make me happy this day month."

"I don't suppose she distinctly denied having given me every encouragement, did she?" inquired his lordship, roughly.

"To tell the truth, I never inquired. I was so absorbed in my happiness, I suppose. But if she did trifle with your affections, my lord, it was only natural. A beautiful woman is always a coquette, and will do as much damage as she can before she gets her wings clipped by marriage. But I will guarantee her future good behaviour."

"I tell you what, St. George, d—n you!" exclaimed the earl, white with rage, "you shall have a hot nest with your dove, if I can learn to kindle a fire. I know where to find the matches, and there's plenty of fuel. You wait; I'll bring such a blaze about your heads, that when you come out of the fire, if you ever do come out, you shall be glad to hide yourself in the kennel with my dogs, to escape the hootings and revilings of your fellow-men. You shall have a pleasant honeymoon, I promise you! You've heard me talk, but you've never seen what I could do; and now I will give you such a specimen of my powers as shall rather astonish you. This day month the wedding is to be, you say. Well, we'll see. Perhaps it will have to be put off; perhaps I'll let you get married first, and have my revenge afterwards; but you may be sure—you know me by this time—that I will have as sure and deadly a vengeance as ever man had, and that you sha'n't have more than one happy day, if so much, with the bride you have won from me."

"I can afford to laugh at your lordship's threats," said St. George, with a shadow of repressed uneasiness in his tone and manner. "I know that men, when they have been disappointed in love, are apt to fly into heroics. If Nina had rejected me, it is very probable that I should have given your lordship a whole volume of angry eloquence, and mouthed my threats and curses almost as valiantly as yourself; but the fortunate lover can afford to pardon something from the unfortunate ditto; and so I tell you compassionately that I will look over your little exaggerations, and allow you the credit of philosophy and resignation before the world. Be as indulgent to me if ever you surprise me in a weak moment, and I shall feel amply rewarded for my virtuous forbearance."

The colonel spoke as if he were soothing a perverse and irritable child instead of facing an enraged man, and his tone of indulgent superiority exasperated the earl more and more. He trembled with rage. His bleared eyes were in a red flame. He tried to command himself, but he could only sink down, struggling, in his chair. St. George turned away his head involuntarily. This dumb wrath was eminently repulsive. He looked at the fire, he moralised on the evils of indulged passions, he sipped his brandy-and-water, then feeling his extremities rather cold than otherwise, he warmed them. This little operation turned his reverie in a new direction. His boots fitted admirably, and Colonel St. George had a remarkably aristocratic foot. He admired it pensively, turning it from side to side, and wondering vaguely what could ever have induced men to adopt a style of dress so conspicuously disadvantageous to any superiority of this kind. "The foot is lost and disgraced in these lapping nether integuments," was his last comment; and he was just lifting these same nether integuments for the full display of his instep and slim ankle when he felt a hand on his shoulder, and turning suddenly, saw Lord Gillingham standing close at his side with two pistols in his hand.

"Choose, be quick," he said in a low, hoarse voice; "for by Heaven, sir, one of us two shall not leave this room alive!"

THE TWIN.

BY CHARLES D. GARDETTE.

"Twas written—"Absence conquers Love!"
Forsooth, fond finale, go wept!
A blindfold vigil well may prove
A weary thing to keep!

But Friendship is an Anchorite,
Whose ever watchful eye
Turns, hope dismayed, toward the light,
And marks the days go by.

And Friendship's vestal lamp will burn
Within its lonely fane,
Till its fair Priestess shall return
To give it oil again!

But sh! should she, for other shrines,
Forget the distant spark,
The lonely lamp no longer shines—
The silent fane grows dark!

Not Absence, then, nor verge of space,
Alone, dim Friendship's glow;
But, Silence, with averted face,
May let the lamp burn low!

HOWLETT'S BATTERY.

A SKETCH, derived from a rebel source, appears on page 132 of this paper, representing the battery which annoys our gunboats on the James river, and recently dismounted one of Parrott's guns. The rebel work is situated on the upper side of the James, in almost a North course from Dutch Gap. The illustration, representing it, is taken from the east, and lies together with our picture and map of the canal itself. We could not have a better illustration of the canal, both in the character of the enterprise and the peril under which it is prosecuted. Our sketch represents the gunners at work on the left, the embankment behind which defend the river at the end of Farrar's Island. Farther back, within the fort, the men are not apparent in the picture. Its position is, however, sufficiently indicated by the direction of the guns and shells.

BATTLE OF HATCHER'S CREEK.
Hancock's 2d Corps flanking the Rebel Works at Armstrong's Mill.

Seize by step Gen. Grant is closing upon the rebel army. The last movement in that direction was made on the 27th October, on a road known as the James, when, at 2 o'clock in the morning, Gen. Hancock, with his corps of 20,000 men, moved out from along the Vaughan road, running south-west, and after crossing Hatcher's creek, found the rebels entrenched in newly made works. Gen. Hancock at once formed them on the flank, and drove them out just beyond Armstrong's Mill.

Our sketch represents this brilliant achievement.

Gen. Grant, in his telegram to the Secretary of War, dated October 28th, 9 P. M., says:

"I have just returned from the crossing of the Boydton plank-road and Hatcher's creek. Our line now extends from Armstrong's mill, on Hatcher's run, to the left by the south bank of Hatcher's creek to the point above stated.

"At every point the enemy was found entrenched, and his works abandoned. Our success was not decided day further than to drive pickets and cavalry inside of their works. Our casualties were light, probably less than 200. The same is probably true with the enemy."

HART'S ISLAND, EAST RIVER, NEW YORK.

THE within the last four years all we have known of its peculiarities has been from books. Our idea of the life of a soldier belonged to the bygone heroic, rather than to this common-place epoch. But very few years ago, as we can be told, like Minerva, a soldier springs armed and equipped, and disciplined for battle. The processes through which he passes are matters of little moment.

Our readers will, however, perceive, from the scene in present picture, that the process which the state should convert a raw recruit into the trained soldier. The genius of our institutions will always prevent our citizens from degrading into soldiers, as the genius of the old monarchical subjects invariably become, but still the natural effect of training shows itself, and the result is that a soldier is made capable of the most intricate evolutions one in the world.

Hart's Island, the barren and desolate spot some few months ago—destitute alike of inhabitants, trees and buildings—is now a busy scene of life and activity. York, in the bend of the East river, at the entrance to Long Island Sound. It is a spot of sand, the highest and most thickly populated spots in our State. All the natural features have been changed, and where there was sand, while there are undoubtedly many trees of natural growth, they are hidden from view by the mass of well and humanely managed as any institution of the kind can be.

Departure of Recruits.

The moment a recruit goes on board the John Romer steamer, which runs from the Battery to his drilling ground, he parts with his personal identity, and ceases to be either his volition. He is no longer free to act as he wishes, but is subject to the orders of his superiors or recruits represents. Every variety of the human race, from the Irish laborer, who is by a fair number broken of his intemperance and his rudeness—the Irish laborer who is by no means a bad soldier, when his despondent indignation and despair—the angry man, who has fallen out with his employer, and the Bowery boy, whom misery has driven into the great net. These, and a thousand other varieties go to make up the mass.

The brilliant tight-ing qualities of our men sufficiently prove that the training is good, and that the material is both and patriotic men, whom the love of the Union has called to the standard.

It is curious to observe how, at first, the sharp word of command, as it issues from the officer's mouth, seems to jar upon the nature of the recruit. It takes time before he can obey the word of reason, and to obey with alacrity the word of command.

Arrival at Hart's Island.

One of the first steps taken on the recruit's arrival is to make him perform various ablutions and transmogrifications, so as to give him a look more like a part of a great machine than an individual. He is restored, and, as it were, uniformed—body docketed—ready for drilling into fits or their regiment when sufficiently drilled.

Many of the recruits declare that, in a short time, they feel a great calm in being relieved from the daily cares of life. The haunting importunity of being obliged to think for themselves, day by day, is removed, and a contented security succeeds to that before. For the first time in their lives, the effect of regular meals and abstinence from stimulants soon becomes apparent, and the body acquires a healthy, vigorous tone to which it had long been a stranger. It is a very curious study to watch the different characters of the men as they develop themselves in their daily intercourse. The quarrelsome become peaceful, the drunken abandon their wrecks, and the vivacious and mercurial acquire a steadier behavior.

Interior of the Barracks.

The first thought that struck us when we entered the barracks was, that they were sickly. The berths had a regularity which was quite unusual of sailor, and the men seemed transformed into a species of borees. We heard, as we passed, a constant chattering, and not something half way between a lengthened grunt and an organ.

It must be confessed that the barracks are very commodious, and well ventilated, now—though at first many complaints were made. But perfection is of slow growth, and the barracks and forms were not built in one day.

The Officers in Command.

It would be difficult to select better officers than those now occupying important posts on the island.

General Hinrichs, the chief, is a gallant and experienced soldier, having risen by conferring from wounds received on the 15th June before Petersburg, where, at the head of his regiment, he displayed traits of the best of works. He has the reputation of being a very exact Disciplinarian, which, when combined with skill, is for his position. He is most ably supported by Captains Stanton and Hoyt, who, by their gentlemanly, courtesy and order are invaluable. Captain Shannon is much missed, as an officer, as well as good citizen, does not appreciate the self-denial and continuous labors of these officers, who have sacrificed much at home to "organize victory." The valor of our officers in the field is well known, and but for the labors of such men as Shannon and Chase and Esan. their efficiency would be impaired. The health of the men have earned for them the respect of even those whom they are constantly subjecting to duty and punishment.

Reading-Rooms and Concert-Room.

At the south end of the island there is a very neat building, which contains a library, two good-sized rooms, one for the officers and other for the men, and a very spacious concert-room, which will also be used for divine service.

A series of concerts will be commenced on the 14th Nov., in which Miss Kate Reignolds, the favorite of the soldiers, the regimental band being the orchestra. The band is in very high state of training of its pieces, the drum-major, Mr. Wiley, having formerly occupied that position in the 7th regiment band.

In the reading-rooms are to be found all the publications of the day, and there are few foreign magazines and newspapers. The number of books at present is very small; but, as they are what is desired, numerous donations cannot fail to come, since all must know that no better charity exists at present than to assist the soldier, but the true conservator of our constitutional liberties.

New Barracks for Rebel Prisoners.

At the extreme southern end of the island, on a sort of peninsula as it were, there are now being constructed barracks capable of holding 5,000 rebel prisoners. They are calculated to accommodate 5,000 comfortably, but will hold more if the service should require it.

Apropos of prisoners, an officer, who has just come from before Petersburg, informed us that, though, as a very significant fact, the great change that has come over rebel deserters in the last twelve months, years ago they were bitter, cowards, vindictive and longed, that is, they did not accept the fortune of war with so much good-temper as to be the next thing to satisfaction of their captors.

The Accommodations.

Hart's Island, which is about one mile in length from north to south, and somewhat less than half a mile in width, affords accommodation for about 5,000 men, although more than 4,000 have been there at the same time. Since the 1st of October, the number of recruits that have been received, trained and dispatched to the front is 10,000. There are at the present time about 2,000 recruits, who are rapidly being drilled into good soldiers.

The Officers' Quarters.

These are very pleasant little residences, with a cottage look, eminently vocative of summer—but a winter's dwelling would be very comfortable. Cleanliness is worth, and as many of the officers have their families with them, they are very much like the old Dutch farmhouses, although somewhat circumscribed in space.

The whole island appears to be kept in the utmost commanding, and has been successively occupied by Generals Brown, Jackson, Barry and General Hincks.

Battalion Drill.

At five o'clock every afternoon there is a dress-parade, which is a very pretty sight, and which is attended at times by their wives. The band of music is in attendance, and plays with very favorable advantage of good both operatic and patriotic. The whole scene is very inspiring.

Conveyance To and From.

The island can only allow as few of words more, and then we will give to the remark there and thence.

On the first day you arrive at Thirteenth Gen. Dix's office, 48 Bleecker street, a pass to visit the island. This is given by Captain Hoyt, who is very kind, courteous and courteous officer.

Then Lieutenant Jackson, Capt. Brett, is presumed, by fiction worthy of Dumas, to start from the Battery at 2 o'clock, and you will arrive at the island at half past seven till nearly 11. The fare to the island is 30 centers. The steamer leaves the island at 9 A. M. stays at the island half an hour, and then departs, leaving the visitor to his own devices for the rest of the day. There are villainous little tin that ever hinged through the water of New York harbor, which, however, somewhat mar the inconvenience in discovering America that the passengers go in the steamer to Hart's Island. Nothing more painful position of a susceptible man, climbed at on your back and sides, by the dirty hands and feet of strangers, whose eyes are dimmed with tears shed on their native shores. We have been there, and have compelled to hold on to the next passenger in a little boat to prevent being thrown overboard on dark, and such nearly as closely a fate and sensitive.

The best way to avoid these unfriendships is certain, since we saw a young and gallant officer at the — U. S. Arsenal, Governor's Island, once by a fair maiden in a blue veil, and finally, without hope of ransom or escape, by a fat old lady with a very wrathful countenance. With such attractive perils it is perhaps not too much to say that you should not go to Hart's Island on a Sunday or sardine box. Nor are your troubles over on landing, for the first thing that meets your eye is a sentry, with such a style of disciplinarian that a fifth wheel would be a comparative luxury. He walks up and down with the wheel which seems always on the point of coming off, and with a musket which he handles with the same air charged only 20 cents, while the handsome and gentlemanly Lieutenant Jackson will charge you only 30 cents for a ride to 27th street, where you can get a car and supper enough to find your way home. Surely the government ought to have a line from Rouse' at 6 o'clock in the afternoon, so to avoid this heavy tax on the recruits. We have endeavored to give a sketch of the redeeming features of the John Romer are Captain Brett, and the gentlemanly and facial steward, Mr. Voorhees. We must not forget to thank Mr. Tyler, the well-known photographer, for his excellent views, some of which we have engraved.

A CRITICAL auditor complained that his clergyman "preached politics," in a certain sermon. On being asked to point out the political bearing of the discourse, he replied:

"Didn't he say 'Pomp of the forest,' and isn't that nigger in the woods, I'd like to know?"

NEW SETTLEMENT OF VINELAND.

THIS is a most remarkable enterprise in the way of colonization. Its features are singularly original. The settlement of a new country has been reduced to a system. It embraces several important features. No land is sold, except for actual settlements, which are very rare. This stipulation enhances the planting of shade trees in front of each place, setting the sides of the road to grass for ornament as well as use, the introduction of social and gentle culture upon an extensive scale, a complete system of education for the young, and religious privileges for the people.

The development of the moral prosperity, the manufactures, the arts and industry of the place are also secured by the policy of the founder. This tract of twenty-seven square miles of land, within one day's railroad between Philadelphia and Cape May, 35 miles south of Philadelphia, offers a most excellent market and climate. The well-known agriculturist and editor of the New York Tribune, Solon Robinson, as well as trail-grower and farmer, has been actual consultant. Last year, pronounced the soil to be of superior quality. It now produces large crops for sale. It is all owned by Charles K. Landis. He started the enterprise in the spring of 1861, and already the settlement contains a population of from 4,000 to 6,000, with a capacity for 15,000.

Mr. Landis has opened 30 miles of new roads and streets, which are lined with buildings, orchards, vineyards and gardens. School-houses, churches and cottages have already been erected. A thriving town has been built in the centre of the tract, wherein manufactories are already prospering. The buildings in the place are of a beautiful description. Mr. Landis has imported the wealthy proprietors of the various Rose Hill cities, New Bedford, Hartford, Providence, Bristol, Newport and Fall River, to provide for the purpose of having homes in a mild and genial climate, and to which they can retire according to their tastes. In the resort also of invalids, the ocean is accessible in 20 minutes. 20,000 trees have been planted, and the peculiar culture of the vine, and the production of the most beautiful and ornamental fruits. Wine and fruit will be specialties, namely, the science of graperies. No intoxicating liquors are allowed to be sold. The settlement is now increasing at the rate 200 per cent. in one year. No land or town lot whatever is sold to speculators.

By a late legislative act a large district of land in Cumberland county, adjacent to Vineland, is annexed to a separate township, and placing it under the general supervision of the chief of the founder, giving it the name of Landis township.

THE LAST HOURS OF PRINCE ALBERT.

THERE has reached us from abroad a most interesting extract from a letter which was written by a member of the Queen's household shortly after the death of the Prince. The extreme sorrow, combined position which the writer held at the time not only the assurance of perfect reliability, but invests the following lines with a very special interest. We can fancy describing the grief and fears of the whole household for the Queen, and the sympathy in her personal loss sustained in the death of Prince Albert:

The last Sunday he passed on earth was a very blessed one to him. He was very ill, but knew it not. He was very ill and very weak, and she spent the afternoon alone with him, whilst the others were in church. He begged to have his sofa drawn to the window, that he might look out on the school, the boys' play-ground, then asked her to play to him, and she went through a host of his favorite airs, without the music—all from memory. After she had played sometime, she looked round, and saw that he was asleep. She played on till it prayer, and his eyes shut. He lay so long without moving that she thought he was fallen asleep. Presently he looked up and smiled. She said:

"Have you asleep, dear papa?"

"Oh, no, dearest," only I have such sweet thoughts."

During his illness, his hands were often folded in prayer, and, when he did not speak, his sacrine fare seemed to say that "happy thoughts" were then in the end. The Princess Alice's fortitude has amazed us all. She has been the help of both her father and mother's firmness depended on her firmness, and she set herself to it.

He loved to speak openly of his condition, and had the most beautiful thoughts of the life to come and prayers. He could not speak to the Queen of himself, for she could not bear it; he listen, and her eyes to the candour. His daughter says that she must say differently, and that she could not, and that she sought rest in his presence. She sat by him; listened to all he said, and when he was silent, and she thought he was no longer, would walk calmly to the door, and then suddenly turn back, overwhelmed with grief. Alice and mother's firmness depended on her firmness, and she set herself to it.

He once said to her:

"I have had a great deal to do, and I am not quite, but that we shall recognise each other and be together in the world to come, I am certain."

It seemed as if it had been intended to prepare her for what was coming, though, of course, it did not strike her then. She said she was not sure that he recognised her, and that now she was in the prayers of her people that she was not forgotten. He said he would not, and that times of agony were before her. She said:

"There's not the bitterness in this trial that I felt when I thought dearest was not prepared, but that now I can see the mercy and love that are mixed in my cup."

Her whole thought now is to walk worthy of him, and to show herself worthy of the high spirit he always manifest, and answer all that she is doing.

THE SHLEST POLITICAL ECONOMIST OF MODERN TIMES.

The shlest political economist of modern times is John Stuart Mill. This is what he says as to the best method of raising money adopted to what point of degradation a country may be driven. It is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in laying on the breaker of actual ruin, to make his selections in giving up the original cause of quarrel, the Freedom of the Press, and the Freedom of Public Meeting. Indeed, that power of evil which it would not grant to retain for the sake of money is a fine large shell pale pedestal of either President Lincoln, Gen. Grant, or any one of the Corps Commanders, together with a certificate, representing a share in a land company near New York, which will be given to the holder on the 22nd February, 1865, or the plan of the Art Journal, which is now in course of publication, can be addressed to Capt. DEPARTURE OF GEN. TOM THUMB, HIS WIFE AND MINNIE WARREN FOR ENGLAND—SCENE ON THE QUARTERDECK OF THE STEAMER CITY OF WASHINGTON, AT NEW YORK, OCT. 29.

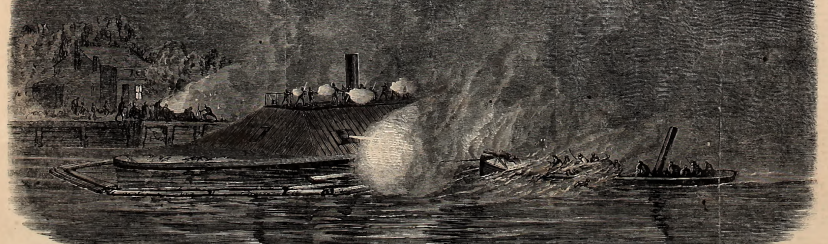
DEPARTURE OF MR. AND MRS. TOM THUMB

And Miss Minnie Warren.

THE steamer City of Washington sailed from this port on Saturday, Oct. 29, at noon, bearing away among her passengers Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Stratton, better known as Mr. and Mrs. Tom Thumb, accompanied by the latter's sister, Miss Minnie Warren. May the little General, and his wee wife and sister (who, if the truth were known, are veritable Queens of the Fairies,) meet, on the shores of the Old World, that warm welcome which is due to three of the greatest—and smallest—marvels of mankind!

This is not the first time that the General has visited the "tight little island" of Queen Victoria, and the cordial greeting with which he was received by his Transatlantic friends and admirers on a former occasion is the best surety that he will be hospitably welcomed now, especially as he carries with him the additional recommendation of a "better half" and their charming little child. "As the husband is, the wife is," says England's laureate, Tennyson; and if Tom be famous, therefore, Lavinia will share his renown. We congratulate each upon the reflected greatness derived from the other. May they have a safe passage across the Atlantic, and may only favorable breezes ruffle the mighty waters which bear upon their bosom the good ship City of Washington!



The scene upon the quarterdeck of that steamer, just prior to her departure, is depicted in the sketch on this page. It was full of interest and animation. Numerous spectators were in attendance, and the little General and his wife and sister were heartily applauded. They also received every attention from passengers on board the steamer and friends assembled to see them off. Many gentlemen saluted Mrs. Lavinia and little Minnie, the latter of whom was held up to view by an old friend, whose likeness in our sketch will readily be recognized by all who are familiar with the public men of New York. Many ladies bestowed a similar attention upon Mr. Tom. And so, amid the ringing of bells and the waving of handkerchiefs, and all the bustle incident to the sailing of a steamship for foreign parts, the family of Thumb sailed away from these shores. They go on a tour of pleasure in Europe, and not for purposes of exhibition; and they anticipate much pleasure in several years of travel. The General, who is now a rich man, living at ease, contemplates, among other pleasures, that of taking new Masonic degrees. He is already a Knight Templar of Freemasonry.

MAP OF DUTCH GAP CANAL.

THE DUTCH GAP CANAL.

THIS magnificent enterprise, the result at once of mechanical genius, military skill, and energetic labor, is steadily progressing towards completion. We give it the place of prominence in our paper this week, and also present, on this page, an explanatory map of the work. The object of the canal is to shorten the route of our gunboats to Richmond, and so enable them to co-operate with the army in the final attack on that long-resisting city. The canal is cut through an isthmus, called Dutch Gap, which connects, with the North bank of the James river, a peninsula, known as Farrar's Island. The nomenclature is slightly Hibernian—but that is no fault of ours. The isthmus of Dutch Gap is 300 yards wide, and 80 feet high on the western side, sloping towards the east. The canal is to cut it across, diagonally, and will thus be about 200 yards long. Passing through the canal, our fleet will save a distance of seven miles, and avoid the rebel obstructions, with which the river is thickly filled, at the end of the peninsula. They will also escape the fire from rebel batteries in that neighborhood. The work was begun in August last, and is now nearly finished. Our Artist has sketched a birdseye view of the canal and its surroundings. In the foreground is the trench, in which our men are at work. Beyond is the northern arm of the James river. In the distance is Howlett's Battery, from which the rebels pepper us with frequent shells. The work, of course, proceeds in the centre of the canal, the ends of which are left standing, to be mined at last and blown out. When finished, the canal at Dutch Gap will rank among the most remarkable achievements of science in modern warfare.

A BRILLIANT NAVAL EXPLOIT—DESTRUCTION OF THE REBEL RAM ALBEMARLE, IN ROANOKE RIVER, ON THE NIGHT OF OCT. 27, BY A TORPEDO BOAT, UNDER COMMAND OF LIEUT. WILLIAM B. CUSHI

DEPARTURE OF RECRUITS FROM THE BATTERY, N. Y., FOR HART'S ISLAND.

ARRIVAL OF RECRUITS AT HART'S ISLAND.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE ALBEMARLE.

The brilliant and daring exploit of Lieut. William B. Cushing, which resulted in the destruction of the rebel ram, Albemarle, is illustrated on page 160. The Albemarle has long been the terror of the inland waters of North Carolina. She was a powerful ram, and was wont to cruise in Albemarle and Pamlico sounds; and, for several months past, she has held at bay no less than 10 of our war vessels, large and small. On a former occasion, in the course of a fight with the Miami, a shot rebounded from the iron side of the rebel monster, and killed Capt. Charles W. Flusser, the Miami's commander. Capt. Flusser was the intimate and dear friend of Lieut. Cushing, who has now bravely and nobly avenged the slaughter of his old comrade.

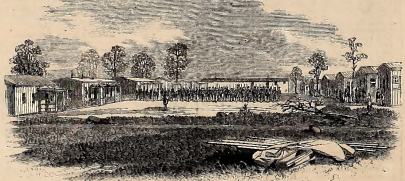
On the night of October 27th, acting under orders from Rear-Admiral Porter, commanding the North Atlantic squadron, Lieut. Cushing embarked on board a steam launch, with a crew of 13, officers and men, and proceeded towards Plymouth, in search of the Albemarle, designing to destroy her by means of a torpedo. Plymouth lies on the south shore of the Roanoke river, about eight miles from its mouth; and here the Albemarle was moored.

Both sides of the river—which averages 200 yards in width—were guarded by rebel pickets. Moreover, the stream itself was obstructed. But neither pickets nor obstructions stayed the advance of Lieut. Cushing. Favored by the darkness, he concealed in eluding observation, till his launch was actually bearing down upon the rebel ram. The latter, secure and unsuspicious, was lying at a wharf, at Plymouth, protected for, about 20 feet, by surrounding logs.

As soon as the rebels perceived the approaches of their enemy, they sprang rattles, rang bells, commenced firing and shouting, and made a racket generally. Lieut. Cushing replied with a dose of canister. Then, finding no gap in the protection of logs around the monster, he made a circuit with his launch, and, with a full head of steam, hurled her upon the logs and towards the Albemarle, bow on. In this perilous position—amid a storm of bullets, the torpedo boom was lowered, and, by a vigorous pull, Lieut. Cushing succeeded in diving the torpedo, which exploded, just as a heavy shot from the Albemarle stove his launch. The rebels continued firing, and demanded the surrender of our gallant party.

INTERIOR OF BARRACKS.—SEE PAGE 139.

Meanwhile Lieut. Cushing and his companions had taken to the water, leaving the torpedo to do its work, which it presently did, in the most effective manner.



Victory, however, was not bought without its usual price. Most of our party were captured, and several were drowned. Their brave commander escaped, and that through much hardship and peril.

Swimming across the Roanoke, he crawled out of the water at daylight, and took refuge in a swamp, not far from a rebel fort. There, lying concealed, close to a pathway, he overheard the conversation of passing rebels, and thus became aware that the Albemarle had indeed been destroyed.

After resting awhile he continued his flight through the swamps, till, by-and-bye, he came to a creek, in which he found a skiff belonging to a rebel picket. Embarking in this, he made his way to the U. S. Valley City, which he reached about 11 o'clock on the night of the 29th.

In his published report of this adventure, Lieut. Cushing speaks with warmest praise of the bravery of his companions, especially commending William N. Howell, Acting-Master's Mate of the Monticello, engineer Stebbins, and William Hoffman, seaman of the Chicopee. The latter was the only man of the party, except Lieut. Cushing, who escaped by swimming. "He did his duty well," says his commander, "and he deserves a medal of honor."

The destruction of the Albemarle is a great relief to our blockading squadron. She was more than a match for any of our light draught monitors. In general features she is said to have resembled the Merrimac and the Tennessee, though she was much stronger.

BATTALION DRILL ON PARADE GROUND.

QUARTERS FOR OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

Her iron ribs were 13 inches in thickness, and were backed by solid timber. Her prow point, however, was beneath the water line, and here the torpedo prevailed against her.

Lieut. Cushing has done a signal service to his country, in destroying this rebel prat, and at the same time has earned new laurels of honor, that will not fade. He will doubtless be advanced in rank.

His share of the prize money—at a fair valuation of the Albemarle—will fall but little short of $50,000. This is not the first daring and gallant exploit in which his valor and energy have heen conspicuous. Yet he is only 22 years of age.

Since the destruction of the Albemarle our forces have taken Plymouth. Wilmington is to be taken next, which will put a check on blockade-running. In a little while, probably, our forces will hold the entire seaboard of North Carolina.

Jones, Chemical Inspector, Circleville, Ohio; Prof. C. T. Jackson, Chemist, Boston; Dr. Chas. Upham Shepard, Charleston, S. C.; and J. V. Z. Blaney, and G. A. Mariner, Consulting Chemists, Chicago, all of whom have analyzed the Catawba Brandy, and commend it in the highest terms, for medicinal use.

Analysis of the Massachusetts State Assayer, Jan. 25, 1858.

When evaporated through clean linen it left no oil or offensive matter. In every respect it is a PURE spirituous liquor. The Oil which gives to this Brandy its flavor and aroma is wholly unlike fusil or grain oil. Its odor partakes of both fruit and oil of grapes. With acids, it produces ethers of a high fragrance. The substitution of this Brandy for Cognac Brandy will do away with the manufacture of fictitious spirits, sold under this name both at home and abroad. Respectfully,

A. A. HAYES, M. D, Assayer to State Mass.,
10 Boylston St.

By the same, in 1864.

I have analyzed "L. LYONS'S PURE CATAWBA BRANDY," with reference to its composition and character, being the same as that produced in past years. A sample taken from ten casks afforded the same results with regard to purity; a slightly increased amount of the principle on which its flavor depends was determined by comparison with former samples.

The indications of analysis show that this Brandy is produced by the same process as most of the imported Brandy. Respectfully,

A. A. HAYES, M. D., State Assayer,

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical
PINEAPPLE CIDER,

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick, than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider contantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $3 per bottle (full quart). For sale everywhere. Sent free by Express on receipt of price, $3. All orders should be addressed to

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the cheap and worthless the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds purporting to be imported, but not so, which for pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fatal admixture, the use of one dose of a genuine article of HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS creates none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the finest roots, herbs, stomachics, and delicious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. No ache to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Bitters advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its assertions are signed by individuals of the highest character and responsibility in calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and counterfeits.

BEAUTY'S TALISMAN.

A dialogue between two young ladies.

CHARLOTTE.

Why, bless me, Eliza, how handsome you're looking! How brilliantly fair! and it seems to me too, That your forehead expands, while in satire, how provoking!
The hair traps encroaching, whatever I do.

ELIZA.

Indeed, ma belle Charlotte, DURANTY'S Soap of Beauty.
This brilliant complexion has left as its cost;
And as to the forehead you praise so, ecoutez!
'Twas defined, as you see, by the Band of Jeune Subtile.

The shade on my lip so revoltingly manish,
As well as the down that my cheek used to wear,
Was compelled by the same preparation to vanish,
And keep my mouth now as both fairly revealed.
Then haste to Broadway 463—
You'll find—

CHARLOTTE.

Dear Eliza, you need say no more,
I am off; I am off, for I can't rest, by heaven!
Till I've been to that store, love, and got, and so,

Au revoir.

PERIODICALS.—We call attention to the advertisement, in another column, of the New York and Liverpool Periodical Agency. This company has for its president that eminent citizen and statesman Hon. Hamilton Fish, and the experienced managers and stockholders, most of high standing, already experienced and interested in the periodical business. Its real estate could not be more favorably residing here for numerous reasons of all. As portion of the profits offered to the stockholders, and also to the agent is now on his way to Europe to sell another portion of it in that market, this sale of stock removes the risk of price from among mere speculations, and places it at once in the category of investment. In which case the change of business affairs and the money market which must accompany our return to peace, such an investment is peculiarly attractive. The demand for periodicals of all kinds has already begun to increase, and must, from the nature of the case, be as permanent as that for articles of clothing. This company, therefore, proceeds upon a basis of real and not of speculative values; it already has already obtained much of the trade for subscription not to make an experiment with, but to obtain certain and satisfactory advantages of an established capital for the proper enlargement of an enterprise proved profitable already.—N. Y. Independent.

To the Public.

The approaching commencement of a new year presents a favorable opportunity for subscribing to FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, which is not only the oldest but the best, as well as the most enterprising Illustrated Paper on this continent, for executing the London Illustrated News in its enterprise and general attractions. Without referring to its past triumphs, we shall merely allude to the present publication, including, which has been historically and pictorially illustrated at every step by our Artists and Correspondents. Not content, as other illustrated papers have been, to rely upon volunteer or chance contributors, we have had a trained corps of the first artists, both foreign and American, to accompany our armies and navies, and furnish us with sketches, taken on the spot, of every interesting event.

It is not too much to say that no important expedition, during the last four years, either by sea or land, has left for the scene of action without FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER being represented in it by an Artist of acknowledged ability and experience. Incredible as it may sound, we have had, since the commencement of the present war, over 80 Artists engaged in making sketches for our paper, and have published over 1,000 pictures of battles, sieges, bombardments, stormings and other scenes, incidental to war.

Nor is FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER less attractive in its other features. It is the only Illustrated Paper in America whose contents are purely original; its stories are not copied from foreign periodicals, but are written expressly for it by the favorite authors of the day. Every number contains an original poem, beautifully illustrated; an original story, with two fine illustrations; besides shorter original stories, sketches, etc., etc., and with a complete digest of the week's news, as well as a spirited description of the eventful scenes depicted in our papers making, in point of fact, every number of FRANK LESLIE'S NEWSPAPER a complete history of the week.

FRANK LESLIE'S not only the most entertaining periodical offered to the public, but a complete pictorial history of the week. In addition to these general attractions, it contains a complete record of the Rebellion, and the last novel alone costing the Proprietor of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED PAPER $5,000, being twice the amount ever paid for a similar work.

We have also to remark, that FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER has never been the organ of a Party, but has always advocated the great cause for which we are fighting, viz: the PRESERVATION OF THE UNION, on which our integrity as a nation depends. This has been the sole aim and object of our editorials, carefully avoiding those sectional views and personal prejudices which are distasteful to all true Americans.

At the present juncture, when so many important movements are in progress, it is our earnest desire that the public should be correctly informed; and to accomplish this object, FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER has Special Artists with Generals Butler, Sherman, Sheridan, Porter and Farragut, as well as with all other armies now in the field.

The Presidential Election.

We have passed quietly through the most imposing, the most momentous, and in many respects, the most critical ordeal of a national election in the history of the United States. The general results are before the country, in the election of President Lincoln, by an overwhelming popular and electoral vote, and in the return of a two-thirds Administration majority in the popular branch of Congress.

To elaborate of causes and resultant effects is here necessary to account for these results. They are simply due to the pressure of that paramount and all-absorbing issue upon the people of the loyal States, the indelible impression of this war, until the rebellious States shall be brought to the point of submission to the supreme authority of the Union. This broad and comprehensive sentiment of the Administration has carried the day against the untenable positions taken by the Democratic party at Chicago, that the war for the Union is "a failure," and that "immediate efforts" should be made for the "cessation of hostilities," in order that negotiations might be tried in behalf of peace. In the face of the oft-repeated and consistent declarations of the leaders of the Democratic party, that they were not for peace, nor enter into any negotiations for peace, except upon the basis of Southern independence, those Chicago propositions were largely regarded by the people concerned in this late election as equivalent to overtures for a surrender to Jeff Davis. Thus the Democratic party, in blindly casting away a golden opportunity for a great success, have been signally defeated.

The people of the loyal States have given their verdict in favor of the war policy of the Administration; they have decreed that there shall be no "cessation of hostilities" short of the overthrow and dispersion of the armed forces of the rebellion. The policy of the Government, under Abraham Lincoln as its chief executive officer, is therefore established for the next four years. All doubts upon the subject are at an end. The opinion is also widely entertained among the rank and file of the Democratic party, that the moral influences of Mr. Lincoln's re-election will immediately and powerfully operate to unite and consolidate the loyal States, and to distract, divide and break up the so-called Confederate States. The implacable feelings of hostility manifested on all occasions by the rebel chiefs and rebel journals to the "Illinois despot," and their anxiety expressed through a thousand channels for a change of policy, as a change in the Yankee Government," have been advanced as fully warranting these hopeful predictions. We congratulate all parties concerned, that the three excitements, jealousies and party wranglings of the Presidential campaign are over, and that the National Government and the loyal States have now a fair field before them for the vigorous prosecution of the gigantic campaign against the armies of the rebellion. We bow to the will of the people.

Jeff Davis to the Rebel Congress on the Negro Enlistment Question.

ANOTHER of those melancholy Jeremiads of Jeff Davis, digitized in rebeldom as "the President's message," which we publish, has been issued to the world. It is a public document but little calculated to cheer the drooping spirits of his friends at home or abroad, but much more likely to depress the shaders of Confederate scrip," or cotton loans in Richmond, New York and London. Jeff frankly informs his legislative assembly that their treasury is on the verge of the fearful abyss of bankruptcy; that the Confederate army is starving, naked and afoot from absenteeism; that he utterly despairs of a helping hand from Europe; but that he is still resolved upon Southern independence or Southern annihilation.

In order to strengthen his armies, he proposes the repeal of all exemptions, and in response to his demands, a bill has been proposed placing the able-bodied of the white-skinned citizens of the Confederacy absent in the North or elsewhere to return and shoulder arms, on pain of the confiscation of their property and other pervasive penalties. Upon the subject of a grant to the slave plantations, in the way of a "black draft," Davis rides both horses. He is opposed to the experiment of arming the blacks as dangerous and inexpedient while with "southern rights;" but he thinks that 40,000 slaves, to begin with, might be trained for the possible contingency of service in the field, with the reward of their personal freedom at the close of the war. Here, however, he is confronted by a Richmond editor, who contends that, according to Southern ideas, the blessings of perpetual slavery would be the proper boon to offer to the slave as a Confederate sword soldier. The irrepressible Senator Foote, who in this capacity represents Tennessee in the Richmond Congress, says, on the other hand, that the Confederate Government has no power over this question of emancipation, that it belongs to the several States, and so the controversy begins. How it will end, the events of a few weeks will probably disclose. We shall not be surprised if this thing of levying upon the slaveholder's negroes, as food for Yankee powder, shall prove to be the fatal package which breaks the camel's back. From what appears to be the state of affairs on this subject, it is apparent that, in being compelled to broach it, he feels that he is in "the last ditch."

The Gold Speculators.

The gold speculators during the last week or two have shrilly appropriated for a rise the excitements of the Presidential election, and rumors and inventions of disasters and stoppages to sherman's army. But we dare say that these expedients for the depreciation of the national currency are now exhausted, and that in good season we shall have such intelligence from Sherman's army, from "Mosey" and the financial allies of Jeff Davis in Wall street into a general stampede. We would, therefore, still advise all parties who have purchases of gold for a rise to make to defer them yet a little longer, as far as practicable, in view of the fall which is coming. "It is a long lane that has no turn."

Less of Politics and More of Literature.

THE Presidential canvass being at an end, and the Administration being re-established for the next four years, several of our late most active New York daily Democratic journals have given notice that hereafter and they will devote their columns less to party politics and more to general news and literary subjects. Let our unemployed poets, fancy sketch and romance writers accordingly hold up their heads and prepare for active service in their proper vocation. They have had a comparatively narrow field of usefulness for the last year or two; but now, in their behalf, we hail the dawning of a brighter day. Indeed, it is our belief that there is "a good time coming" for us all.

Summary of the Week.

SHENANDOAH VALLEY.

Gen. Early has evidently been considerably reinforced, since, on the 11th Nov. he has assumed the offensive by a strong cavalry reconnoissance. The front of the advance consisted of Gens. Custer and Merritt, near Keamstown, four miles south of Winchester. After heavy skirmishing the Union forces fell back, in order to draw the rebels on; but after advancing to where the Union forces were in position, they retired hastily, their purpose apparently having been accomplished. Early the next morning skirmishing was renewed, and, after some fruitless fighting, Gen. Powell's division attacked the enemy and drove them beyond Front Royal, capturing two cannon, 120 men, several wagons and a large number of horses. The losses are said to be heavy on both sides.

GEORGIA.

There is much uncertainty as to Sherman's position, the Government keeping his movements secret.

A dispatch from Chattanooga, dated Nov. 11, says that on Monday morning, Nov. 7, at daylight, the rebels attacked our pickets south of Atlanta, killed one, wounding two of the 1st Indiana, but subsequently they fell back. On Wednesday morning the rebels made three attacks on Atlanta, which being thrown so far as Decatur, Ga. The most desperate attack was made on the Rough and Ready road. The rebel artillery was within 600 yards of our rifle pits, and firing briskly and dismounted cavalry within 200 yards. Our men were aroused from their slumbers and quickly manned the defences, and soon repulsed the rebels off. The rebels were part of Young's command, and they finally retreated towards Macon. Our army is in excellent spirit and well supplied with rations. The weather has been quite cold at Atlanta. The Cincinnati Gazette has a dispatch from Nashville, which denies the reported evacuation of Atlanta by Gen. Sherman, and the destruction of the Atlanta and Chattanooga railroad.

TOWN COSSIP.

The election is over, and after a storm there comes a calm. The work is done, and both victor and vanquished, with that philosophy which is characteristic of the American people, have instantly settled down into a supreme acquiescence in the result, and which, we have discussed with so much earnestness and force. "The election is over," is the answer to any would-be agitator. The Government has been chosen for the next four years, and every man, bearing the least pride as an American, no matter on which side he voted, will put his shoulder to the wheel, and work faithfully and truly with that Government. He can feel that in the events of a terrible civil war, fought on the bloody fields, a revolution has been accomplished, a bloodless one; one that in its quiet working does more to secure the permanency and our own future than all that the most brilliant strategy, or the most reckless bravery.

Through a city supposed to be inhabited by a population the most mixed and unreliable in the world, there was not the slightest or attempted outbreak or riot. Some attributed this to the known presence of Gen. Butler and a half score thousand of troops in our midst, but the more thinking portion of the community adjudged it to the true cause, the positive earnestness of the people, and the conviction on each side, that this was the final struggle. And in saying that we believe ourselves justified in asserting that it is the first time that a presidential election has been held in one of which they have realized anything else of election day than a holiday and a time for relaxation and rude enjoyment. Even the lowest classes are exhilarated to be sure by those which occurred among us on Tuesday last that we have not ended in something more than a row. We only can see an example. In some of the Wards, the 22d for instance, in consequence of the immense number of voters, the polls were kept open unusually late. The bulk, hundreds of waiting voters had to be shut away when the polls closed at sundown, without having put in their votes. Many of these, however, knew that they would for hours. We feel that in any other land than this, or had the people been less accustomed to the exercise of it, there would have led to an outbreak and the shedding of blood. As it was the shut-out patriots took the matter very quietly, and each pacified himself somewhere that the unpolled votes belonged to them as a unit.

With the cessation of a great war comes the cessation of the excitement of war. We realize that we have the law and their employers, and between the people and the street railroad companies. In the latter case the employers have the law, and are very generally returning to work at the old prices, or such as the employers choose to offer. Where there is any importance in the matter, much more so than appears on its face. Managers whom the settlement which will end a response in almost every mind. A well-known comedian said upon the street a few days since, that he had been offered $40 per week for singing in his present theatre, but that he could get $100 per week if he would go to Boston. "What is your trade?" was the inquiry. "Why, I am a saloon, and could earn $6 a day." "Why do you not do so?"

"Because," answered the tailor, "I am on a strike."

The gentleman ceased his fumbling, and looking the tailor straight in the face, said:

"My good fellow, I have always a dollar for the man who cannot work or cannot get work, but not a cent for one who can work and who has work thrust at him. Good-day!"

Of the other small war—that of the cars—there is only a faint, distant and occasional rumbling. The people cannot afford to fight for so small an issue, and will not encourage those who do. The matter is to all appearance settled, and the companies have it their own way, the last point of opposition being that of the New York Sun, which offers to become retailers of the tickets if the companies will place them in their hands for that purpose, which most assuredly the companies will not do.

During the last week the remains of the supposed murdered and quartered man were buried, consigned to earth without identification, and in all probability the matter will be wrapped in perpetual mystery. It seems indeed wonderful that such a deed can occur in our midst, and have been advertised to the extent of this, and yet not a clue be gotten, even though every incentive has been offered for its elucidation. The theory now offered is that the thing is a practical joke of some medical students, who, for the purpose of making an excitement, have taken some body received for dissection, quartered and distributed it in the rivers and bay. This may do very well for a theory, but it will never do for a fact. Firstly, such a joke never could be accomplished without the knowledge of the professors; secondly, the body presented no such evidence, and thirdly, the chance of identification was just as strong in that case as in any other. The fact is that a fearful murder has been perpetrated, and the doers of it have been fortunate or smart enough to execute it without leaving any trace. The old saying that "murder will out" is not always true.

One of the most remarkable things is what becomes of our money. We were not so much disposed to wonder when gold and silver disappeared, for that was an inevitable sequence of its rise in value, but now we do wonder at the disappearance of the pennies. This currency is not worth sending out of the country, having been coined down to present value, and yet as fast as the mint sends them out they disappear. The master of the mint informs us that within the past four months eighteen millions of these circular bits of copper have been launched on the community, and yet the circulating medium as represented by them is just as scarce as ever. Added to this six millions of two cent pieces have been sent forth, and yet how often do we receive one in change? We have no theory for it, save that all the world is like a certain friend of ours who goes about with a pocketful of the new issues, offering to match pennies with all creation, and boasting that he is engaged in saving up a barrelfull for future use.

Everybody is discussing the probability of a new call for men and a consequent draft. We hardly think any fear may be encouraged of a new call. More men must be had, but there will be no necessity for a new call, seeing that the last one has not yet been answered. Five hundred thousand men were wanted, and so far on that call about one hundred and fifty thousand have been furnished; while three hundred and fifty thousand are due. This trifling balance it will be necessary to have, and our patriotic fellow-citizens may quietly make up their minds that they will have to toe the mark. They have endorsed the war and all its little belongings, and there is no reason why they should not take a hand. Uncle Sam has enough greenbacks to pay a million more of men, and enough veteran troops, who, to a man, approve of the call and of the draft to enforce any of his wants.

Our Amusements.

Firstly, the opera, the new season commencing with this week, during which we are promised many novelties, the greatest of which being the new opera of "Don Sebastiano," by Donizetti, being his last work but one. The libretto is by Scribe, than whom the world never produced one more accomplished as a librettist, or better understanding all the requirements of the stage. It was written and produced at Paris in 1844, and was more than a success, and for three seasons was the marked favorite of the Grand Opera.

The story is that of Don Sebastian, King of Portugal, who reigned from 1557 to 1578, amusing himself and his people by making raids and general scrimmages against the Moors, in one of which raids he was sent to kingdom come, but his body not having been found among the slain, the idea seized upon his followers that the King had only stepped out for a short furlough of a few years, and would assuredly return to lead them once more to battle. While they waited patiently for this good time, impostors would occasionally arise, claiming to be the King, and upon this idea the opera is based.

In the first act the King (Massimiliani) is about departing for a small fight with the Moors, when he is approached by the poet Camoens (Bellini), who begs his clemency for Zaida the African (Carozzi Zucchi), who has been condemned to death for doing a little poisoning. The King, struck by her beauty, pardons her, and, as a recompense, is blessed by Camoens, who predicts his success and happy return, under which blessing the King sets sail for Africa, where, in the second act, he is defeated by the Moors, and is saved from death by Zaida, who somehow mysteriously turns up about this time in the house of her father, and with an Arab lover, by name Abadialoe (Lorini).

The next turn of the dice brings Zaida and her Arab lover to the royal palace at Lisbon as ambassadors from the Moors to that court, and the King and Camoens, out of funds and somewhat dilapidated, to the same spot, where they recognise each other; and it is agreed that the King shall declare himself, which he does, but only to be extinguished by the people, who by this time have been so imposed on by false Sebastians that they are not ready to believe in any, and as a consequence seize the King and bear him off for trial. The whole affair ends with a grand trial scene, in which Zaida is mixed, and the condemnation of both to torture and death, giving a chance for Susini (as Grand Inquisitor) to do some rather extensive warbling.

Without doubt the opera will be a great success, the scenic arrangements promised being of the most magnificent, and the whole force of the company, musical, artistical and mechanical, being brought to bear upon it.

With the theatres there is little to record. Mr. Owens, with his Solon Shingle, keeps the Broadway crammed nightly, to witness one of the most artistic personations ever offered on the New York stage, and enters upon his twelfth week of his performance of that part.

Maggie Mitchell, as Fanchon, is winning a reputation in New York that will not leave her.

Wallack next week produces a new play by Boucicault. Mr. Lester Wallack plays Bob Tyke in "The School of Reform."

The French Theatre is once more open, and is worth every one's visitation, if it were only to see with what spirit the actors enter upon their work, and how thoroughly the audiences enjoy themselves.

HAMILTON'S FEDERALIST.

Now that a Republican Governor has been elected in New York, it is likely that the public will hear less, in future, about "State Sovereignty" as opposed to Federal Supremacy, in the administration of the laws. Nevertheless, we trust that students of our politics will not neglect to make themselves perfectly well acquainted with the precise nature of the relations existing between the States and the general Government, under the Federal Constitution. In studying this subject, no book affords greater aid than that splendid memorial of profound statesmanship, "The Federalist"—a work that testifies at once to the genius of our institutions and the genius of Alexander Hamilton, the foremost statesman of the Revolutionary period. A new edition of this work, edited by Mr. John C. Hamilton, of this city, the son of its principal writer, has lately been published. It is in every respect trustworthy. Mr. Hamilton is a scholar, a Conservative in politics, and, as a writer, is remarkable for the terseness, grace and elegence of his style.

We characterise his edition as the best one extant, because its editor has studied his father's works with a tender interest and a reverent care, necessarily surpassing the fidelity of strangers. It will be remembered that Mr. Hamiliton long ago edited the writings of his father, exclusive of the "Federalist," in seven volumes, and also published a "History of the Republic of the United States, as traced in the Writings of Alexander Hamilton and his Cotemporaries."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The rebels have managed to collect quite a little fleet of pirates on the coast. In addition to the Tallahassee, they have now the Chicamauga and Olustee. All these vessels are said to have escaped from Wilmington, N. C. The Chicamauga, commanded by Lieut. Wilkinson, burned three ships on the 30th and 31st Oct. The Olustee, under the command of Lieut. Ward, captured two schooners on the 3d Nov. The crews of all these have been paroled as prisoners of war.
